The following reports for the third calendar quarter of 1989 were received too late to be included in the published reports for that quarter:

REPORT

PURSUANT TO FEDERAL REGULATION OF LOBBYING ACT

P	QUARTER
	1st	2d	3d	4th
(Mark one square only)

IDENTIFICATION NUMBER

Is this an Amendment? ☐ YES ☐ NO

NOTE on ITEM "A".—(a) IN GENERAL. This "Report" form may be used by either an organization or an individual, as follows:

(i) "Employee".—To file as an "employee", state (in Item "B") the name, address, and nature of business of the "employer". (If the "employee" is a firm [such as a law firm or public relations firm], partners and salaried staff members of such firm may join in filing a Report as an "employee".)

(ii) "Employer".—To file as an "employer", write "None" in answer to Item "B".

(b) SEPARATE REPORTS. An agent or employee should not attempt to combine his Report with the employer's Report:

(i) Employers subject to the Act must file separate Reports and are not relieved of this requirement merely because Reports are filed by their agents or employees.

(ii) Employees subject to the Act must file separate Reports and are not relieved of this requirement merely because Reports are filed by their employers.

A. ORGANIZATION OR INDIVIDUAL FILING:

1. State name, address, and nature of business.

2. If this Report is for an Employer, list names of agents or employees who will file Reports for this Quarter.

☐ CHECK IF ADDRESS IS DIFFERENT THAN PREVIOUSLY REPORTED

NOTE on ITEM "B".—Reports by Agents or Employees. An employee is to file, each quarter, as many Reports as he has employers, except that: (a) If a particular undertaking is jointly financed by a group of employers, the group is to be considered as one employer, but all members of the group are to be named, and the contribution of each member is to be specified; (b) if the work is done in the interest of one person but payment therefor is made by another, a single Report—naming both persons as "employers"—is to be filed each quarter.

B. EMPLOYER—State name, address, and nature of business. If there is no employer, write "None."

NOTE on ITEM "C".—(a) The expression "in connection with legislative interests," as used in this Report, means "in connection with attempting, directly or indirectly, to influence the passage or defeat of legislation." "The term 'legislation' means bills, resolutions, amendments, nominations, and other matters pending or proposed in either House of Congress, and includes any other matter which may be the subject of action by either House"—§ 302(e).

(b) Before undertaking any activities in connection with legislative interests, organizations and individuals subject to the Lobbying Act are required to file a "Preliminary" Report (Registration).

(c) After beginning such activities, they must file a "Quarterly" Report at the end of each calendar quarter in which they have either received or expended anything of value in connection with legislative interests.

C. LEGISLATIVE INTERESTS, AND PUBLICATIONS in connection therewith:

1. State approximately how long legislative interests are to continue. If receipts and expenditures in connection with legislative interests have terminated, place an "X" in the box at the left, so that this Office will no longer expect to receive Reports. ☐

2. State the general legislative interests of the person filing and set forth the specific legislative interests by reciting: (a) Short titles of statutes and bills; (b) House and Senate numbers of bills, where known; (c) citations of statutes, where known; (d) whether for or against such statutes and bills.

3. In the case of those publications which the person filing has caused to be issued or distributed in connection with legislative interests, set forth: (a) description, (b) quantity distributed, (c) date of distribution, (d) name of printer or publisher (if publications were paid for by person filing) or name of donor (if publications were received as a gift).

(Answer items 1, 2, and 3 in the space below. Attach additional pages if more space is needed.)

4. If this is a "Preliminary" Report (Registration) rather than a "Quarterly" Report, state below what the nature and amount of anticipated expenses will be; and, if for an agent or employee, state also what the daily, monthly, or annual rate of compensation is to be. If this is a "Quarterly" Report, disregard this item "C4" and fill out items "D" and "E" on the back of this page. Do not attempt to combine a "Preliminary" Report (Registration) with a "Quarterly Report."

STATEMENT OF VERIFICATION

[Omitted in printing]

NOTE on ITEM "D."—(a) IN GENERAL. The term "contribution" includes anything of value. When an organization or individual uses printed or duplicated matter in a campaign attempting to influence legislation, money received by such organization or individual—for such printed or duplicated matter—is a "contribution." "The term 'contribution' includes a gift, subscription, loan, advance, or deposit of money, or anything of value, and includes a contract, promise, or agreement, whether or not legally enforceable, to make a contribution"—§ 302(a) of the Lobbying Act.

(b) IF THIS REPORT IS FOR AN EMPLOYER.—(i) In general. Item "D" is designed for the reporting of all receipts from which expenditures are made, or will be made, in connection with legislative interests.

(ii) Receipts of Business Firms and Individuals.—A business firm (or individual) which is subject to the Lobbying Act by reason of expenditures which it makes in attempting to influence legislation—but which has no funds to expend except those which are available in the ordinary course of operating a business not connected in any way with the influencing of legislation—will have no receipts to report, even though it does have expenditures to report.

(iii) Receipts of Multi-purpose Organizations.—Some organizations do not receive any funds which are to be expended solely for the purpose of attempting to influence legislation. Such organizations make such expenditures out of a general fund raised by dues, assessments, or other contributions. The percentage of the general fund which is used for such expenditures indicates the percentage of dues, assessments, or other contributions which may be considered to have been paid for that purpose. Therefore, in reporting receipts, such organizations may specify what that percentage is, and report their dues, assessments, and other contributions on that basis. However, each contributor of $500 or more is to be listed, regardless of whether the contribution was made solely for legislative purposes.

(c) IF THIS REPORT IS FOR AN AGENT OR EMPLOYEE.—(i) In general. In the case of many employees, all receipts will come under Items "D 5" (received for services) and "D 12" (expense money and reimbursements). In the absence of a clear statement to the contrary, it will be presumed that your employer is to reimburse you for all expenditures which you make in connection with legislative interests.

(ii) Employer as Contributor of $500 or More.—When your contribution from your employer (in the form of salary, fee, etc.) amounts to $500 or more, it is not necessary to report such contribution under "D 13" and "D 14," since the amount has already been reported under "D 5," and the name of the "employer" has been given under Item "B" on page 1 of this report.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 23, 1990)

The Senate met at 11:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As we reverence God, prayer will be led by the Senate Chaplain, Rev. Dr. Richard C. Halverson.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

In God is my salvation and my glory: the rock of my strength, and my refuge, is in God. Trust in Him at all times; ye people, pour out your heart before Him: God is a refuge for us. Surely men of low degree are vanity, and men of high degree are a lie: to be laid in the balance, they are altogether lighter than vanity. Trust not in oppression, and become not vain in robbery: if riches increase, set not your heart upon them. God hath spoken once; twice have I heard this; that power belongeth to God.—Psalms 62:7-11.

In the wisdom and spirit of these strong and wonderful words from the Psalmist, may the Senate enter into its work this week, Father God. We pray in the name of Jesus Christ in whom is all power. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, this morning, following the time for the two leaders, there will be a period for morning business until 12:30 p.m. with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each. The Senate will recess from 12:30 to 2:15 p.m. for the party conference luncheons.

Upon reconvening at 2:15, under the provisions of a unanimous-consent agreement, the Senate will proceed to executive session to consider the ILO Convention under a time limitation of 1 hour. A vote on the convention will occur at 3:15 p.m. today.

Once that treaty has been disposed of and the Senate has returned to legislative session, the Senate will consider H.R. 2281, the school dropout bill. This bill will also be considered under a 1-hour time limitation with a vote occurring on H.R. 2281 at approximately 4:30 p.m. today.

THE REVISED WETLANDS PROTECTION AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE CORPS OF ENGINEERS AND THE ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION AGENCY

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, a revised version of the long-awaited wetlands protection agreement between the EPA and the Army Corps of Engineers was signed on February 6.

Plans to carry out this landmark agreement were suspended three times since the original agreement was signed on November 14, 1989.

The agreement between the EPA and the Department of the Army articulates the policy and procedures that are used in determining the type and level of mitigation necessary to comply with the environmental requirements for wetlands filling under section 404 of the Clean Water Act.

Recently, I indicated that the continued reluctance of the administration to put this limited wetlands protection agreement into effect raises serious doubts about the level of commitment to the President's oft-stated goal of no net wetlands loss.

The revised wetlands accord reflects the price paid by EPA and the Army for the administration's acquiescence to its implementation. It may prove to have been too high a price.

The changes made to the original agreement not only threaten to undo the agreement itself, they more importantly threaten to undermine EPA's environmental regulations for section 404 wetland filling permits.

Two key changes were made in the original agreement that thwart its intent to ensure that, to the extent practicable, adverse wetlands impacts are avoided; that unavoidable adverse impacts are minimized; and that remaining adverse impacts are offset.

First, the revised wetlands agreement allows deviation from the stepwise consideration of avoidance, minimization and compensation for what are termed "insignificant environmental losses."

The original accord allowed deviation from this sequence when "the EPA and the corps agree that the proposed discharge can reasonably be expected to result in environmental gain." The administration-imposed revision adds the phrase "or insignificant environmental losses" to the end of this sentence.

If insignificant environmental losses are not clearly limited to de minimus discharges or discharges that have only minimal individual and cumulative adverse environmental impacts, this change could allow much wetlands loss that otherwise could be avoided or offset.

Moreover, because the term "insignificant environmental losses" is not defined or clarified by the agreement and is not a term used in the Clean Water Act or the section 404 regulations, it is likely to generate many disputes about whether proposed discharges into wetlands will lead to significant environmental losses.

The second, more egregious modification on which the administration insisted could seriously weaken the present EPA 404(b)(1) environmental guidelines for filling in areas where there is a high proportion of wetlands.

The revised wetlands agreement adds a footnote which ostensibly seeks to clarify a statement that it may not always be practicable to mitigate to the extent needed to ensure no net loss of wetland values. The footnote states that "avoidance, minimization, and compensatory mitigation may not be practicable where there is a high proportion of land which is wetlands."

The scope of this possible exception to stepwise consideration of measures to avoid, minimize and offset adverse wetland impacts is potentially enormous. Most significant wetland areas of the United States may qualify as "areas where there is a high proportion of land which is wetlands" because the geographic frame of reference for the phrase is not clear.

For instance, does this phrase encompass all of the Nation's coastal areas? Does it refer to any county or city with a high proportion of wetlands?

Additionally, the agreement does not clarify what proportion of land has to be wetlands for it to qualify as high.

Does high mean 99 percent? 79 percent? 20 percent? Or 10 percent? The agreement does not say.

The current EPA environmental guidelines require all requests for wetland filling to meet the same requirements with respect to avoidance, minimization and compensation regardless of whether they occur in areas where there is a high proportion of wetlands or where there is a low proportion of wetlands.

These guidelines and the original agreement make clear that avoidance, minimization and compensation are required only to the extent practicable. Practicability has nothing to do with the proportion of land that is wetlands.

By concluding in advance that avoidance, minimization and compensation may not be practicable in areas where there is a high proportion of land that is wetlands, the revised agreement makes it far less likely that adverse wetlands impacts will be avoided and that unavoidable adverse impacts will be minimized in such areas.

With these changes in last November's agreement, there is now real reason to question whether it will encourage additional protection of wetlands in the natural state and help prevent the net loss of these valuable aquatic resources.

The wetlands agreement certainly does not match the President's rhetoric in support of a national goal of no net loss of wetlands.

It can only be hoped that the corps and the EPA will interpret their revised policy guidance in a manner that preserves the integrity of the Clean Water Act's environmental standards for wetlands filling.

RESERVATION OF LEADER TIME

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my leader time, and I reserve all the leader time of the distinguished Republican leader.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the unused time of the two leaders will be reserved.

MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There will now be a period for morning business to last until the hour of 12:30 p.m. today, with Senators permitted to speak therein and not to exceed 5 minutes each.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PRESSLER] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

DAKOTA CIGARETTES

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, this morning an editorial appeared in the Sioux Falls Argus Leader, a newspaper of my State, entitled "Dakota Cigarettes? Yuck! Give Product New Name." This article refers to the issue of a major tobacco company naming a new cigarette "Dakota." The name of the cigarettes could be insulting to Sioux Indians who long have used the word "Dakota" to identify a tribe in the northern plains. Also, the product name is a blemish on the image of South Dakota and its sister State to the north which have shared the name Dakota for more than a century.

Mr. President, I would like to share with the Senate this editorial. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It was bad enough when Miller Brewing Co. test marketed wheat-brewed "Dakota" beer in 1986.

The beer must not have fared well. It did not become a regular company product.

Now, a cigarette company is trying its luck with the name.

If South Dakota is lucky, Dakota brand cigarettes will not find a niche in the market, either, at least under its present name.

Dakota is the name that has been given cigarettes R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. plans to test in April in Houston. The target market, according to a Washington Post report, is 18- to 24-year-old women, the only group of Americans whose rate of smoking continues to increase. More specifically, the company is reportedly after young, poorly educated, white women—so-called "virile females."

An ad campaign is expected to be aimed at women who enjoy the TV show Roseanne, partying, cruising, attending hot-rod shows and tractor pulls with boyfriends and whose chief aspiration is to get married. Some of that information apparently comes from marketing data that may not figure into company plans.

Reynolds officials have acknowledged plans to market Dakota cigarettes, but have provided few details. They denied, however, that Dakota cigarettes would be intended only for women.

Regardless of the target audience or the insulting nature of the marketing data prepared for the company, plans for the Dakota cigarette are distasteful. The product name is a blemish on the image of South Dakota and its sister state to the north, which has shared the name Dakota for more than a century.

The product name also is potentially insulting to American Indians, who long have used the word Dakota to identify a group of tribes associated with the Northern Plains.

By one definition, the word Dakota means friend. Clearly, cigarettes are not friendly.

Experts estimate that smoking causes about 400,000 premature deaths a year in the United States. Tobacco addiction is blamed for ailments ranging from lung cancer to strokes.

As Dr. Louis W. Sullivan, head of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, has said, it is reprehensible for a company to lure young people into smoking.

Cigarettes do not fit the thoughts of rugged but clean and natural splendor that people often associate with the word Dakota. The image has helped Dakota become a trendy name in business in recent years. Companies have used the name for products ranging from pickup trucks to computer terminals.

The attention had been flattering, for the most part, until Reynolds joined the parade.

Reynolds, by the way, is the same company that recently was forced by public opposition to cancel plans to test market "Uptown," a brand of cigarettes aimed at blacks.

Reynolds ought to find a new name for its new cigarette. And the company ought to leave Dakota out of it.

Mr. President, I would like to compliment the Sioux Falls Argus Leader. I might also add that Dakota is often a name for women. It is a beautiful name. I had a senior citizen in my office recently who was named Dakota Hildebrandt. We from South Dakota hope we do not have a cigarette named Dakota.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that another article on this subject from the Washington Post be printed in the RECORD, along with the target customer profile entitled "The Virile Female."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post]

MARKETERS TARGET "VIRILE FEMALE"; R.J. REYNOLDS PLANS TO INTRODUCE CIGARETTE

(By Michael Specter)

The R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. plans soon to introduce brand of cigarette that, according to the detailed marketing strategy prepared for the company, targets young, poorly educated, white women described as "virile females."

Reynolds plans to test the new brand, called "Dakota," this April in Houston. The marketing plan's chief goal is to capture the lucrative market among 18- to 20-year-old women, the only group of Americans whose rate of smoking continues to increase. The competition for that group has become intense.

The marketing campaign focuses on a certain group of women whose favorite pastimes, according to the marketing plan, include "cruising," "partying" and attending "Hot Rod shows" and "tractor pulls" with their boyfriends.

Reynolds officials said in a statement that Dakota is not aimed solely at women. "Different products are designed to different categories of consumers," the statement said, "Dakota is no different. It is not a male brand or a female brand." Reynolds officials would not elaborate, and it could not be determined whether the marketing report, prepared by Promotional Marketing Inc., had been accepted by the tobacco company.

The extensive proposals for "Project V.F.," for virile female, were provided yesterday to The Washington Post. They describe the preferred "Dakota" smoker as a woman with no education beyond high school, whose favorite television roles are "Roseanne" and "evening soap opera (bitches)" and whose chief aspiration is "to get married in her early twenties" and spend her free time "with her boyfriend doing whatever he is doing."

Disclosure of the marketing recommendations, dated Sept. 21, 1989, comes just three weeks after Reynolds was forced by strong opposition to cancel plans to test market "Uptown," a brand of cigarette aimed at blacks. The marketing study for Dakota shows how the cigarette was designed to "replace Marlboro as the brand of choice among female smokers 18-24."

"It is especially reprehensible to lure young people into smoking and potential lifelong nicotine addiction," said Health and Human Services Secretary Louis W. Sullivan, when asked about the Dakota marketing plan. Sullivan led the fight against Uptown. "And the risk that smoking specifically poses for women adds another tawdry dimension to any cigarette marketing effort aimed at younger women."

Sullivan said that next week he will launch a new initiative against smoking. He plans to testify before the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee on the practice of targeting tobacco advertising.

Reynolds acknowledged plans to market Dakota yesterday, but reacted angrily to questions about the study.

"Reynolds does not know what these documents contain," the company said yesterday in a statement. "Reynolds does not know if they are authentic or fabricated . . . . If they are authentic, they represent stolen, proprietary information belonging to R.J. Reynolds, and which would be of great value to our competitors."

"We do our work for Reynolds," said Steve Gilries, vice president of Promotional Marketing, when asked about the report. "We did that for Reynolds, and they will be glad to tell you all about it."

As millions of better-educated, prosperous Americans have quit smoking, tobacco companies have turned their marketing efforts increasingly on the poor, minorities and young women who have become their most solid customers. Targeting sales to specific niches is a common, accepted practice in virtually every aspect of American advertising, but it has become extremely controversial when applied to tobacco products aimed at groups at unusually high risk for the fatal diseases caused by smoking.

Cigarette companies argue that they are only trying to lure customers from one brand to another and that since their product is legal, it makes perfect sense for them to seek the most likely potential buyers.

But public health officials and opponents of smoking say it is unfair to compare selling cigarettes to selling cars, clothes or stereos because cigarettes are the only legal product that kills people when used as intended.

"All the cigarette companies are now facing the fact that tobacco is no longer a growth industry," said former surgeon general C. Everett Koop, a well known foe of smoking. "They are killing several hundred thousand of their customers each year and they need to be replaced. How can they do that? By exploiting foreign markets and young girls, the one group of Americans that have not begun to cut back. It's absolutely deplorable."

Tobacco use has become the largest preventable cause of death and disease among American women, killing more than 125,000 each year, according to federal health statistics. Recent studies have shown that women who smoke one to four cigarettes a day have two to three times the risk of heart attack as women who do not smoke.

But beginning in the late 1960s, when Philip Morris pioneered the women's market with its "Virginia Slims," tobacco companies have struggled to tap the emerging independence and buying power of women.

"What the companies have done is target the most vulnerable population," said Anne Marie O'Keefe, a board member of Women vs. Smoking Network, a group that attempts to unite women's organizations to fight tobacco use. "The women they describe in that document are old enough to want to assert their freedom and independence, old enough to take risks but young enough not to be able to appreciate such abstract concepts as addiction, chronic disease and mortality."

The marketing study goes into great detail about "positioning Dakota as the choice among YAFS [young adult female smokers] aged 18-24."

It estimates that the number of young women who smoke Marlboro is 1,695,006. That figure was derived by multiplying the total number of women aged 18 to 24—14,968,532—by smoking incidence—23.3 percent—and then by Marlboro's market share—48.6 percent.

The plan also outlines future advertising options based on interviews with small groups of potential consumers. "Cannot be too tough, i.e. bitchy/cold (motorcycle jacket)," the memo states. "Cannot be too cute, giggly. Women cannot be too submissive (i.e. fawning at man who looks disinterested.)"

The memo goes on to state that after the "brand's image is established, we can explore greater extremes," and says that, "Where smooth comes easy" is by far the best slogan.

In addition to describing a "demographic/psychographic review" of the "virile female" as one whose "work is a job; not a career, a way to make money," the report describes this person's dress ("jeans, knit tops, sweaters, shorts. . .",) (favorite music groups ("all male groups") and interests ("partying with friends," "dancing" and "cruising").

It also includes many possible promotions that could help stimulate consumer interest in the cigarette. They include creating a rock group called "Dakota" to play at special events around the country, the development of "on-pack" contests for consumers to select their favorite movies, songs, rock groups, television shows. Others include gambling premiums, "V.F. Soap Opera Trivia Videos" and subscriptions to Soap Opera Digest.

"These young people are the future of smoking," said Virginia Ernster, chair of the department of epidemiology and biostatistics at the School of Medicine at the University of California at San Francisco. "It's blue-collar people without enough education to understand what is happening to them. It's just pathetic that these companies would work so hard to get these women who may not feel much control over their lives."

THE "VIRILE FEMALE"

Excerpts from the "demographic/psychographic review" of the "virile female," prepared by a marketing research firm for R.J. Reynolds:

Caucasian Females, age 18-20 (secondarily 21-24).

No education beyond high school,

Entry level service or factory job.

Attitude toward work: Work is a job, not a career,

Dress: Jeans, knit tops, sweaters, shorts, warm-up suits, sweatshirts, pants.

Favorite TV program: Roseanne.

Favorite music: Classic rock-and-roll from the '60s and '70s.

Aspirations: To have an ongoing relationship with a man; to get married in her early twenties and have a family.

How she spends her free time: With her boyfriend doing whatever he is doing.

Interests, activities and places the target gathers: Partying with friends; dancing, going to dance clubs and bars (those over 21 or with a borrowed ID), cruising; watching television (entertainment they can afford); shopping at the mall.

Events they attend: Drag races; motorcross, motorcycle races; hot rod shows, cycle shows; tractor pulls, monster trucks; wrestling; "tough man" competitions.

CAMPAIGN FINANCE REFORM

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I wish to proceed on one other subject; that is the issue of campaign reform. I hope we have campaign reform. I am prepared to support limitations on PAC's, to eliminate the millionaire's loophole, to deal with the issue of soft money, to control third-party expenditures, and even eliminate them.

Also, we must look at the tax exempt status of organizations that spend money in campaigns. We also must count organizational efforts and limits on those efforts, be they by labor unions or businesses. Sometimes organizations like labor unions say they are merely spending the money to inform their own members and these amounts are not counted towards spending limits. But farmers, independent small businessmen, and independent workers are not members of these organizations and fall under different rules. This is not right.

I hope the Senate moves quickly on campaign reform. I think it is one of the leading topics of this session. In the past, we had partisan battles. I do not wish to try to score points on anybody. I think we all need to work together. Each side traditionally has had a campaign bill favorable to itself. Let's end this partisan bickering and get on with it. I think the American people want and deserve true campaign reform.

LEWIS R. HOLDING: A MAN WHO TELLS IT LIKE IT IS

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I suppose it is a tendency among all of us to collect reading material for later perusal, but sometimes weeks and even months pass before we get around to it. And with a high degree of frequency, we wish we would have done it earlier.

During the Christmas holidays, I ran across the text of an address that had been delivered last October 23 at a small business symposium in Raleigh. The speaker was Lewis R. Holding, chairman of the board of First Citizens Bank & Trust Co. of Raleigh. Mr. Holding, who is known as "Snow" by his many friends, a nickname he received as a child, rarely makes speeches, but when he makes one, he speaks from the heart. And he does not grope for the popular things to say. As the saying goes, he tells it like it is.

Mr. President, I was fascinated by Snow Holding's entire speech of last October, but I was most intrigued with his comment about such things as education and giving our young people the necessary incentives. He talked about pension plans, Federal handouts, and a number of other subjects.

Senators ought to read this speech. Some will disagree, perhaps, with parts of it, but all of us should at least consider what Snow Holding has said.

I seldom put speeches in the RECORD, Mr. President, but this one I shall.

Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that a text of Mr. Holding's speech be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY LEWIS R. HOLDING, SMALL BUSINESS SYMPOSIUM, RALEIGH NC, OCTOBER 23, 1989

It is a real honor to have the opportunity to speak to you this evening and to participate in this program.

Secondly, I can tell you without any reservation that North Carolina has been fortunate indeed to have the services of the Honorable Harlan Boyles, Treasurer of the State of North Carolina. He has national stature and an impeccable reputation in North Carolina for honesty and fair dealing. We need to keep him where he is.

In the few minutes that I have, I would like to share with you some thoughts, hopes and dreams of and for North Carolina. These dreams are not only for those living North Carolinians but for those yet to be born. I'd like to take a few minutes to do a little sketch about the past, and to take a look at the present. Then, most of all, I want to talk about the future.

North Carolina has been most fortunate in terms of the type of people who settled this state. We have people of all races, all faiths. We are a people who have been able to live and work together for more than two hundred years. This compatibility and harmony is our greatest asset and our primary heritage. It was true in the past, and it is true today. In my judgment, it will be true in the future.

Reviewing the past in terms of education, we need to look at the forward step taken by Governor Aycock in the development of North Carolina's public education system. Coming out of the War between the States, our state literally led the South in the development of public education.

There has been a lot of talk recently about how our system is ranked forty-ninth in the nation. I am as ashamed of that as you are. I would remind you, however, that of all the states in the Union, North Carolina has one of the very highest percentages of its population enrolled in public schools (approximately twenty percent).

We talk about how much money we have or haven't spent on education. I would assure you that North Carolina has not slighted education in terms of the gross state product. This is not to say that we shouldn't do more. But, we have certainly not neglected education in the past. It is also important to remember that our higher education system ranks 5th in the nation in terms of the percentage of the state gross product allocated to our institutions of higher learning.

Now, let's look back a moment at the history of our highways. We haven't been standing still. I wasn't there, but I know about former Governor Cam Morrison's road program that linked every county seat in this state. North Carolina was leading the country. We weren't following—we were leading.

Then Governor Kerr Scott came along and built more roads. Today we have more miles of paved road than any state in the Union. Now, there are those who will insist that it's too costly to keep up these smaller state roads and that their maintenance is at the expense of the bigger roads we need. Well, having been reared in Johnston County, I have a few observations about that.

We didn't have many paved roads. In fact, most of them were in Smithfield—a total of about four blocks. In those days you couldn't buy a new automobile. Folks used to get used cars from Washington, D.C. where they had been driven on paved roads. They'd bring those cars down to Johnston County and wear them out in one year on those washboard roads.

Well, I'll tell you one thing. I'd rather pay more taxes—more gasoline taxes, more income taxes, than to buy more cars from Detroit where they want $25 an hour so they can sell cars to North Carolinians who make $6 an hour. Kerr Scott understood that and he did something about it.

The same leadership applies to water and our other natural resources. A great deal has been done to preserve the water sheds—just look at Lake Norman, Lake Gaston, Kerr Lake and Jordan Lake.

We don't have much of a past history in waste disposal. This is because it wasn't a problem until we became a real industrial state and until the advent of atomic waste. We are working hard on this and are nearing a resolution of the problem.

Now, I would like to reflect a little about the social, economic and political environment that existed. We have had in the past, particularly in the last twenty-five years, rising expectations on the part of all of our people—those less fortunate and those more fortunate. These expectations have been fostered by certain persons for their own political aims and ambitions.

Now, let me say this to you—I don't think there's a darn thing wrong with people wanting to have more. There's nothing wrong with wanting to participate more and to advance to the maximum of one's potential. I think it's a great thing about America and our state in particular, that people want more. We can build on a bedrock of healthy aspirations.

A look at North Carolina's economic history shows that we have evolved from a agricultural economy and a low wage paying textile economy. Now we have moved into the world of high tech. With centers like the Research Triangle Park, the Tarheel State is attracting some of the finest and biggest companies in America. These industries are paying wages far beyond anything our people could have dreamed of fifteen or twenty years ago. If you don't believe me, just pay a visit to Philip Morris in Concord, Miller Brewing in Eden, Clark Equipment in Statesville, Johnson & Johnson in Johnston County, Dupont in Kinston and Timken in Lincolnton. The recognition of the need for economic development and the energy and thrust to make it a reality, came from former Governor Luther Hodges. He woke us up in terms of industrialization. What has happened is unbelieveable. It is the stuff that legends are made of.

Now let's touch on our past political environment. Beginning around 1880 we had a one party system in North Carolina. It was a stable system. Because we had a primarily agrarian economy and because the legislature only met every two years, we were able to attract the best minds to serve. Senators and Representatives could come to Raleigh and spend ninety days every two years without it being too much of a burden. There wasn't much turnover in the General Assembly so there was a lot of continuity. The situation is vastly different today.

To sum up those thoughts on our past, I would say that North Carolina was able to exist as if it were an island. We charted our own course and went our own way, socially, economically and politically. We were able to do our own number and, I would submit, we did it pretty good.

But, ladies and gentlemen, things have changed. With the advent of a global system as outlined by Mr. John Medlin and the introduction of television, jet air planes, cargo shipping . . . My Lord, this world is a different world.

And, where do we find ourselves in terms of the subjects we have been reviewing? I have some thoughts about all of this that I want to share. Please understand that what I have to say is in no way meant to be critical. I mean to be constructive and to suggest how we might approach the future.

We have the matter of rising expectations that I outlined and which I heartily endorse. We are confronted with the migration of the less fortunate from the farm to the cities. In the city they cannot have a milk cow, they cannot raise chickens, they cannot have hogs. We have always thought of this phenomenon as a national concern, associated with major urban cities. But in North Carolina we have not and should not think we have escaped this problem.

Where do we stand with education and how can it meet the challenges of a global economy and social migration? You've heard the ratings. I must tell you that former Governor Jim Hunt recognized one thing above all else. He recognized that if people cannot read in today's world they become unemployable. If they cannot read, they cannot write and they cannot compute. If they can't participate and be productive then you and I are going to have to support them. They are going to have a poor opinion of themselves and we won't be able to build enough prisons to lock them up.

Dropouts don't begin in the eighth, ninth and tenth grades. They begin in the first, second, third, fourth and fifth grades. If they can't read, can't write, and can't compute, we need to forget about taking them to the airport to see the jets take off.

The other day while riding from my home to the office, I saw all these boys and girls walking around the Capitol and state government. Little ones, walking around there—just having a big time. It's my personal opinion that this is a criminal waste of their time and your money. All we have to do is produce a videotape about state government which can be a hell of a lot better and more informative, and put it in every school in North Carolina. This could be done for less than a million dollars and stop all this needless transportation expense. But, really, it's not the expense I'm worried so much about. It's the needless waste of time. These young people need to spend their school hours learning to read and write and compute.

The day is fast approaching when you will not even qualify to be a maid in a hotel without the capacity to read, write and compute. Hotel employees now use little computers to track their work and their inventories. If we do not do something for the less fortunate to enable them to be gainfully employed, we are going to have to support them for the rest of their lives.

I don't care how many PhD's we graduate or attract to North Carolina because there are plenty more dropouts. These people are dropouts because they have not mastered the basic skills early in their school careers. The PhD's can take care of themselves. We have to take care of the dropouts.

I would suggest that we have an inordinate misconception in this state and throughout the United States about what constitutes an education. Everything is geared to college . . . go to college . . . go to college. Well, the world is full of highly successful people who have never darkened the door of a great university. We have a very fine community college system, headed by former Governor Bob Scott, that has a significant role to play in our education portfolio. I am particularly impressed with the products of our excellent technical schools. In these schools we've got a tool that deserves the support of every businessman, politician and citizen of this state. All of us are not college-bound. Have you ever tried to get anyone to repair a damn thing? Brother, you'd better buy a new one. Forget about having it fixed. That's where we are today and we need to do something about it. Higher education isn't the answer. A renewed emphasis on basic education and skills is what we need.

It seems to me that it is imperative that there be a closer working relationship between our public schools, headed by North Carolina Superintendent of Public Instruction Bob Etheridge, and our community colleges and technical schools. The curriculums offered should be coordinated and structured so that those who are truly college bound will be prepared for the experience and that those who are not college bound will have a learning program which not only assures them of acquiring basic educational skills but also other skills which will enable them to be productive and self supporting.

What about our political system today? We have a strong two party system in this state. It's not a dream, it's a fact.

You know though, that we're all North Carolinians. We've got differences of opinion but thank God we've got politics and politicians because that's the reason we don't have revolutions. We politic things out. We talk about the issues, and we seek new methods and new solutions. For things we can't work together on, we go our separate ways. But in the present, as well as the future, this two party system is going to continue to be a way of life. I hope that in the public's best interest, our politicians will be able to differ but always communicate. They need to talk things over. It's surprising what those rascals can come up with when they want to.

While I'm on the subject, I want to commend the General Assembly for passing the Bill that appropriated $8.6 billion for the highways. It's one of the great things that has happened in our state in recent years. The only trouble is that it's not enough. I'm for more. We've got a hundred bridges at least, that a school bus can't go over because it has been determined that they are unsafe. Yesterday I drove up to Littleton and around Roanoke Rapids. It was such a beautiful day. Not all the road development and traffic problems are in Raleigh. Our Bank goes from Murphy to Beaufort and from Wilmington to Elizabeth City, and I can tell you that the road problems are everywhere. If we are to provide the kind of economic opportunity to benefit the less advantaged and enhance the opportunities for the more advantaged we'd better get on with it. We don't need a twelve-year program or a thirteen year program, ladies and gentlemen, we need a seven year program.

And, I'll comment on something Mr. Medlin talked about. Government has no intention of curtailing spending. You can forget it. Spending is out of control and it's going to cost us so much more than just dollars. It's going to cost us if we delay our educational program and our highway program. You can't imagine the sheer replacement cost of a crumbling facility. But more importantly, there is the economic cost to our fellow citizens and to the state itself. People will produce if given an opportunity. But if they can't produce—we won't have the necessary tax base and tax revenues. We must put out the seed money to get things started and we must endeavor to lead not to follow. Let's emulate the example of Governors Aycock, Morrison, Scott and Hodges—and forge ahead.

Now, in Washington anyway, when you say a billion right quick, it sounds like a million. This brings me to the question of budget balancing. We pride ourselves on pay-as-you-go, balancing the budget. I'll defer to Treasurer Boyles to answer all questions on this subject but I'll submit that it's been many a year since North Carolina has balanced the budget. The last accounting I got showed that the unfunded portion of the state's retirement fund was greater than the bonded indebtedness. The last General Assembly failed to fund the state retirement fund by tens of millions of dollars. We're all full of promises to state employees but we're not putting up the money. We ain't paying the piper. I would ask you to consider what would happen to First Citizens Bank or Fieldcrest Mills or the Wachovia Bank if we ran our pension funds that way. I'll tell you what would happen to John Medlin. They'd put him behind bars in Atlanta. That's just a fact. If what I've said is not true, the Treasurer will have an opportunity to refute my remarks when I sit down.

Now, let's talk about the future. We can't be worried about China, Japan and Germany. We should try to learn from them. I don't necessarily subscribe to Mr. Medlin's theory that the United States is falling behind because we are only going to grow 1 percent in population and that our gross national product is only going to reflect a 2 percent growth. Our future is up to us. Forty years ago Japan and Germany were defeated nations in rubble. Yet today, they are the only countries who've got any significant surplus foreign exchange.

Success is a question of priorities, a question of leadership, a question of dedication. Over and over again in our history, the American people and North Carolinians in particular, have responded in a very positive way to real and dynamic leadership. Tar Heels know the truth when they hear it. I haven't always agreed with the results of every election but basically, North Carolinians are careful. They will embrace sound programs and they will turn thumbs down on irresponsible people, governments and institutions. We've got an unbelievably good government. If you don't think so, go to other states where they are indicting Governors, locking up Secretaries and Treasurers, prosecuting Legislators and so forth. They have for years, and keep on doing it. It's sort of like a mountain politician who asked me one time, "You know what you do with a rabbit when you catch him?" I said "No, Sir." He said, "You skin him." Well, we've not ever done that in North Carolina and we're not doing it now.

While we're talking about government and institutions, I'd like to mention the Savings and Loans. Mr. Medlin says that it's going to require some 160-200 billion dollars to bail them out. I'm here to tell you that the bail outs of HEW, HUD and the Farmers Home Administration are going to make the Savings and Loan figures look like chicken feed. Listen, I'll take the Savings and Loans—and take them all—compared to that. I can grasp the problems of the Savings and Loans, but I cannot grasp the morass at HEW, HUD and FHA.

But, come what may, our government is not going to allow gross disinflation. Even Washington is smarter than that. They will simply print the money to pay the debts. This means inflation.

Therefore, it is all the more important that we provide the essential elements that create opportunities for North Carolinians. We need to be about this business and I would encourage the Legislature and the Governor and all members of government to assume leadership positions in this endeavor. The people will follow. They've proved it over and over again.

But, my friends, one thing that greatly concerns me about the people is their lack of true economic understanding. Man is capable of noble deeds and good works. However, inherent in every man is sin. There is also selfishness, acquisitiveness and entrepreneurship. When you defy or deny these truths, you are contradicting the very nature of man.

The Communists believe that they can make the new man. If you have not read "Das Kapital" you need to read it, although you probably won't because you don't have enough hours to wade through it. Karl Marx talks about making a new man to each according to his needs and from each according to his ability. Well, I'll tell you what I don't want to do. I don't want to let's all get poor together. And if you don't believe there aren't any poor in Russia, think about those recent pictures on television of destitute coal miners living in complete squalor.

In Russia, a very small group of about seven million people run the country. They are registered Communists and they are highly organized. The rest of the Russian population is worse off than you can possibly imagine. If you look at the scenes from the Armenian earthquake versus the California earthquake you'll see exactly what I'm talking about. Look at the people, their surroundings, their clothes, their shelters. Considering the same Richter Scale measurement, compare the loss of lives.

We have two kinds of people in America and two kinds of people in North Carolina. We've got the less fortunate and the more fortunate. But think of this. To be an American of any kind, you have a leg up. To be a North Carolinian to boot, you're even one step closer to heaven.

Let's talk about the future. We've got an opportunity here to take advantage of the nature of man and accept him for what he is, me included . . . and you, and capitalize on it. That's what we ought to do and that's what we started out to do in this country. Now, in our attempt to "do good" we are in fact defying man's true nature.

I heard on the news the other night that, in Washington, there was some question as to whether or not people ought to be permitted to rebuild on Palm Island, south of Charleston, in the wake of Hurricane Hugo's devastation. Well, when in the world did the government take it upon itself to decide that? Now, it's another matter if the government doesn't want them to have flood insurance. That's all right. But, if somebody wants to go down there and spend $200,000 on a beach house, I don't think the government ought to have a damn thing to say about it. I also don't think the fellow should come crying when his house gets washed away. The government should define the flood plain and the citizen should be allowed to build if he can get the financing. We don't need all these agencies and all these people directing everything and making choices for us from the cradle to the grave. It's denying the nature of man. It's killing initiative. It's stifling acquisitiveness. If you can get something without working, why work for it. If we are going to take care of people from birth to death, why should they work.

Fellow North Carolinians, all of us in this room are among the most fortunate. We've got to provide opportunities for every person in our state through education and through jobs. We have to create a climate which makes it possible for our young people to feel that they can become successful—not that success is guaranteed, but that they have a chance. The chance to get ahead will motivate a man or woman more than anything you can possibly do for them. You can't give them enough to get up in the morning, work all day and work overtime unless it's the opportunity for them to make more and have more. Take that incentive away and you're stifling initiative—denying the nature of man and killing the goose that laid the golden egg.

I plead with the members of government, both state and federal, to bear this in mind as they contemplate legislation and formulate the rules and regulations by which we all must live.

I would like to say this in closing. The responsibilities of those individuals serving in the governments of our state and nation are truly monumental. The magnitude of their challenges is tough to contemplate.

They need to actively seek and implement ways to unleash the nature of man. The resultant forces will do more to solve America's problems than anything else. Great opportunities lie ahead. Here in North Carolina we have the leadership in place to make all things possible. In addition, we have undiscovered leadership potential and we can look forward to the new and innovative approaches that these individuals will generate.

I would remind you, and everybody's got to blow his own horn a little bit, that we do not run the First-Citizens Bank according to national average or trends. We walk our own road—and this road benefits North Carolina. We protect our customers, protect our borrowers and serve our state. We are not in the business of buying and selling and taking the highest dollar, wherever it might be. We had the opportunity to participate in loans from Brazil to Zaire at 15 and 18 percent plus three points up front, plus one over the prime. We never bought the first damn loan, and we've been successful. We kept the money in North Carolina.

Thank you very much for the opportunity to be with you tonight.

WE CAN'T REMAIN NEUTRAL: JAMES H. MEREDITH

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, as many Senators know, I am privileged to have as a staff a man who has made a contribution to our Nation's history, James H. Meredith, whose friends know him as "J.H."

One of Mr. Meredith's goals is to warn Americans of all races of the crisis we face as the traditional American family slowly disintegrates. He has devoted much of his time to researching the adverse and destructive effect the liberal welfare state has had on our Nation's families. I shall be sharing it from time to time, beginning today, and in the coming months.

Mr. President, "J.H." reminds us that 1,500 years ago the once-mighty Roman Empire collapsed. Common wisdom contends that Rome was overwhelmed by vicious barbarian hordes. The real story is very different.

Rome was not conquered by the armed mobs of Europe and Asia in one pitched battle. In "The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," the great English historian Edward Gibbon tells us that it took 300 years for Rome to fall. In fact it took longer for Rome to fall than most nations survive. But despite all of its wealth and power, Rome collapsed of its own weight. It was destroyed from within.

Mr. President, Rome's death was agonizing. It suffered through 300 years of intellectual and spiritual decay. The Roman people witnessed centuries of government expansion, bureaucratic incompetence, debased currency, bloated budgets—and, more important, the wanton disregard for the institutions of law and family which had built the Roman state in the first place. The family unit in particular was wrecked by centuries of neglect and indifference.

Does that scenario sound familiar? I realize historical analogies are not perfect, but when I read Roman history I am fearful for America—particularly as I look around and see what is happening on our streets and in our homes. Like Rome, we are collapsing from within and the destruction of the American family is the root cause.

The great American family is fast disappearing. Fifteen million American children are growing up today without a father; one-fourth of all live births occur out of wedlock; the number of divorces now reaches 1.2 million per year. In fact, one of every two of today's marriages will end in divorce. These numbers represent the greatest social emergency in our history.

The disintegration of the family is a prime cause of crime and drug abuse and is the best explanation for the crisis we have reached in education and the continuance of poverty despite the largess of the welfare state. Combine this with our acceptance of violence and pornography in our everyday lives, and you see why we are fast becoming a new Rome.

Mr. President, our democracy is in grave danger, but it is not from any foreign foe. It is no accident that the totalitarian tyrants of this century have tried to destroy the family unit. From Moscow to Havana, the prophets of government planning have deliberately crushed the family and replaced the authority of the family unit with the power of the tightly controlled party bureaucracy.

The Communists understand that where strong families exist, individual freedom advances and the power of government retreats. Where the family withers away, government moves forward and finally dictates.

Marxism makes the removal of the family the cornerstone of its creed. Our Government has unwittingly followed the same pattern, perhaps with the best of intentions. In fact, one of the greatest threats to the family is the enormous welfare state that has been created. Because Government proposes to be the solution to every problem, family resources are squandered in the search for new programs. In other words, Government steals from the family in order to save it—in the form of more taxes and less parental authority.

Mr. President, the family has been forced to give up its power to the courts and the regulation writers. It has been forced to give up its voice in education and social policy to the ever encroaching public official. It has been forced to give up its hard-earned wages to the insatiable welfare state.

It is time to declare that traditional families are the source of any nation's strength. Families who choose to have children are protecting our future. Families who choose adoption over abortion are to be praised. Parents who choose to raise their families themselves, instead of leaving it to somebody else, should be encouraged, not penalized by unfair taxes. Public policy must support these and other fundamental family decisions.

We can no longer afford to be neutral. We become a part of what we condone. If we do not reverse our course, America will find itself on the ash heap of history precisely as the Marxist despotisms and the Roman Empire did before them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time has expired.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator wish additional time?

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FOWLER). Without objection, it is so ordered.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT—S. 1630, S.J. RES. 212, AND S. 1430

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that S. 1630, the clean air bill, not be displaced should any motion to proceed to Senate Joint Resolution 212, the Armenian genocide resolution, be adopted and that S. 1630 remain the regular order at any time, notwithstanding the provisions of rule XXII, at the discretion of the majority leader, after consultation with the Republican leader.

I further ask unanimous consent that, if there is a cloture vote on the motion to proceed to Senate Joint Resolution 212 on Thursday, February 22, and if it is unsuccessful, the majority leader, after consultation with the Republican leader, may proceed at any time to the consideration of S. 1430, the national service bill.

I further ask unanimous consent that, if a second cloture motion is filed on the motion to proceed to Senate Joint Resolution 212, the vote on that cloture motion occur on Tuesday, February 27, at 2:15 p.m. and, if the motion to proceed to Senate Joint Resolution 212 is agreed to, S. 1430 not be displaced thereby.

If either cloture vote is successful, I ask unanimous consent that the majority leader, after consultation with the Republican leader, may at any time proceed to the consideration of S. 1430, the national service bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, as I understand the Thursday vote, we hope to agree on some mutually satisfactory time with the leadership and the distinguished President pro tempore.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, that is correct.

Mr. President, for the information of Senators, if consent is granted to this request, it is my intention to ask unanimous consent today, after the second scheduled rollcall vote, which is now scheduled to occur at approximately 4:30 p.m., to proceed to Senate Journal Resolution 212, the Armenian resolution. I understand and anticipate that the distinguished President pro tempore intends to object to that consent request, at which time I would move to proceed to the resolution, which motion to proceed would be fully debatable.

It is then my understanding and expectation that the distinguished Republican leader, who is the author and principal sponsor of the resolution, would file a cloture motion which would set up a cloture vote on the motion to proceed to the resolution on Thursday. Under the rule, of course, that vote would occur 1 hour after the Senate convenes on Thursday. But, after discussing it with both the distinguished Republican leader and the distinguished President pro tempore, it is my understanding that there will be further consultations to determine whether a time other than 1 hour after convening on Thursday would be more convenient for them and for a larger number of Senators. If so, that decision will be made and announced tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the unanimous-consent request of the majority leader?

Hearing none, the request is agreed to.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I thank my colleagues, both the distinguished Republican leader and the distinguished President pro tempore, and, therefore, announce for the benefit and information of Senators that following the second scheduled rollcall vote today, I will ask unanimous consent to proceed to Senate Joint Resolution 212, the Armenian resolution. Senator BYRD indicated his intention to object to that request.

At that time I will make a motion to proceed to the resolution, which is, of course, a debatable motion. And Senator BYRD has indicated his intention to be prepared to address the Senate on that issue at that time.

We will then be in session, I would estimate, talking to the two principal participants, for a couple of hours today for debate on it. And tomorrow, following the appearance of President Havel at the joint meeting with the House, we will return to the Armenian resolution in the early afternoon, as soon as we complete proceedings with respect to President Havel, and will stay on that resolution for debate tomorrow until approximately 7 p.m., if that is agreeable to the Senators.

By then we will have determined and announced whether the vote will occur 1 hour after convening on Thursday morning or at some other time during the day on Thursday.

That is the schedule as now anticipated.

On Thursday I will announce, following discussions with my distinguished colleagues, what our plan will be with respect to the national service bill. That will depend to some extent on what happens on the cloture vote that will occur sometime on Thursday.

TRIBUTE TO PATRICK POUZAR

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to Mr. Patrick Pouzar, of Nashville, TN, who was killed while on an official visit to Chile in his capacity as a Food and Drug Administration investigator. I want to take this opportunity to acknowledge the tremendous sacrifice Mr. Pouzar made in the interest of protecting U.S. citizens and his many worthwhile contributions during his career with the FDA.

I hasten to add that the tragedy that struck down Mr. Pouzar also took the life of another FDA official, Mr. John Harty. Both men left the United States in January on their second trip together to the Republic of Chile to closely review the variety of security precautions initiated by Chilean fruit processors and export officials. These actions became necessary as a result of the public scare in this country stemming from the discovery of chemically contaminated grapes imported from Chile nearly 1 year ago.

Following a tour of several fruit processing centers in northern Chile, both FDA officials, joined by a representative of the Chilean Agriculture Service and an executive of the Chilean Exporters Association, began their journey back to Santiago. En route, their small plane crashed and everyone on board perished.

The Food and Drug Administration depends heavily on the expertise and commitment of its people. Throughout its history, the FDA has distinguished itself as the national guardian of consumer safety. The dedicated people who shoulder the burdens imposed on the FDA have created and supported a system to ensure a safe food and drug supply that is second to none.

Mr. Pouzar was one of these people. Throughout his long career with the FDA, Patrick Pouzar made public service his highest priority. He and his colleague will be sorely missed, but their many contributions to the betterment of American society will endure.

I know that all Tennesseans join me in extending to Mr. Pouzar's mother, wife, and three daughters our condolences and prayers during this very difficult period. Our sympathies also go to the families of Mr. Harty, the Chilean officials, and the plane's pilot.

Finally I want to express deep appreciation to the Chilean Government and to Ambassador Errazuriz for their diligence and compassion in expediting the return of Mr. Pouzar and his colleague to their homeland.

TRIBUTE TO BETTY NIXON

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, today I rise to pay tribute to a friend and fellow Tennessean, Betty Nixon. Betty has worked tirelessly for our State over the years, and I was privileged to have her on my staff here in Washington last year.

Now, I have known and admired Betty Nixon for many years. As a 12-year member of the Nashville City Council and an activist deeply committed to bettering our State, Betty has played a key role in Nashville's efforts to improve housing conditions, better transportation, and encourage economic development. Betty has earned respect and gratitude all across our State for her work, and I can only add to those sentiments.

Last year, as a member of the staff of the Governmental Affairs Subcommittee on General Services, Federalism, and the District of Columbia, which I chair, Betty Nixon used her experience with local government to help us here at the Federal level better serve our States and localities. For example, she looked at the massive problem of the decay of America's infrastructure and recognized the need to open up a dialog on the issue between infrastructure experts and State, Federal, and local legislators. Betty succeeded in facilitating such a dialog which provided valuable guidance to local officials around the country.

Mr. President, I could go on praising Betty Nixon for quite some time. But most importantly, let me say that Betty is a trusted and valued friend. From our days together at Hillsboro High School, to her work as my campaign manager, to today, Betty is someone who merits my admiration and gratitude. And I can add with pride that Betty Nixon is one of the most respected and popular elected officials in the history of Nashville.

As of the first of this year, Nashville is again fortunate to have Betty Nixon living and working within its borders. As much as we here in Washington will miss Betty, I know that she will do an outstanding job in her new role assisting Vanderbilt University in its local, State, and Federal relations. I know my alma mater will benefit greatly from her service, and I wish Betty Nixon the very best.

TERRY ANDERSON

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to inform my colleagues that today marks the 1,802d day that Terry Anderson has been held in captivity in Beirut.

I would also like to note that Mr. Anderson's sister, Peggy Say—who has been tireless in her efforts to free her brother—recently began a "journey of peace, reconciliation, and hope" in an attempt to gain further international support for her most noble cause. Mrs. Say has met or will meet with the International Committee of the Red Cross, Pope John Paul II, the Archbishop of Canterbury Robert Runcie, UNESCO Director-General Frederico Mayor, Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa, and Yasir Arafat.

I would like to wish Mrs. Say well in her travels and reiterate my respect and steadfast support for her efforts.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that three articles detailing Peggy Say's tour be reprinted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

[From the Buffalo News, Feb. 9, 1990]

PEGGY SAY LAUNCHES TRIP IN BID TO FREE BROTHER

NEW YORK.—Peggy Say, sister of Terry Anderson, the longest-held Western hostage in Lebanon, is launching a "journey of peace, reconciliation and hope" to Europe and the Middle East in a bid to free her brother.

Mrs. Say will meet today with U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar to begin her mission, which will include meetings with Pope John Paul II in Rome, the archbishop of Canterbury, Robert Runcie, in London and Palestine Liberation Organization Chief Yasser Arafat.

"In Terry's last videotape in October 1988, he asked that the United States use its influence in a positive, not a negative way," she said. "I intend to make that same appeal to all of those who may have influence in this hostage situation."

"I want to appeal for an end to the suffering of all people in the Middle East, including these innocent hostages," she added.

Anderson, chief Middle East correspondent for the Associated Press, was seized March 16, 1985, in Beirut. Seventeen other Western hostages—seven Americans, four Britons, two West Germans, two Swiss, an Italian and an Irishman—are being held in Lebanon.

During the tour, Mrs. Say and AP executives also will meet with the European Parliament's Committee on Human Rights in Strasbourg, France; the International Committee of the Red Cross in Geneva, Switzerland; UNESCO Director General Federico Mayor in Paris and Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa in Damascus.

Mrs. Say said efforts to meet with Iranian officials received no response. Sheik Mohammed Hussein Fadlallah, spiritual head of Hezbollah, the pro-Iranian Shiite Moslem movement in Lebanon, declined to meet with the group outside Lebanon.

Anderson is being held by a group calling itself Islamic Jihad, or Islamic Holy War, generally believed to be one of several groups operating under the umbrella of Hezbollah.

The AP delegation includes photographer Donald Mell, who was with Anderson when he was kidnapped, and Larry Heinzerling, who has been serving as special assistant to AP President and General Manager Louis D. Boccardi on the Anderson case.

"The approach of the fifth anniversary of Terry's captivity carries with it the clear message that there is no point in continuing his cruel ordeal," Boccardi said of the tour.

"Our group will try to convey publicly what we have tried to convey privately—that is, that in the name of humanity, it is time for Terry Anderson to be allowed to come home."

Public and private efforts throughout the world, involving scores of governments, organizations and individuals, have failed to obtain Anderson's freedom.

Most visible in these efforts has been Anderson's sister, who has campaigned tirelessly on her brother's behalf. The Associated Press has supported Mrs. Say's efforts and pressed its own efforts to win Anderson's release.

Mrs. Say, formerly of Batavia, N.Y., and now of Cadiz, KY, said church groups in Buffalo and Batavia plan to organize a nationwide fast and prayer through March 16 "for an end to the suffering of the people of the Middle East." Anderson graduated from Batavia High School.

The Buffalo Area Metropolitan Ministers called on Americans to select a day or days of fasting and prayer in support of the hostages, culminating in a 24-hour fast beginning the evening of March 15.

The Rev. Dr. Charles R. White, executive director of BAMM, could not be reached for additional information on the group's plans.

POPE TELLS MRS. SAY HE PRAYS FOR CAPTIVES

VATICAN CITY.—Pope John Paul II met Wednesday with the sister of Terry Anderson, the longest-held Western hostage in Lebanon, and said he would pray for him and for an end to the bloody conflict in the Middle East country.

"Your brother is a journalist and he is a hostage. This is a terrible, terrible thing," John Paul told Peggy Say, speaking in English.

Anderson, chief Middle East correspondent for The Associated Press, was seized in Beirut on March 16, 1985.

Mrs. Say, formerly, like her brother, a resident of Batavia, N.Y., was received in private audience by the pope during a tour of Europe and the Middle East in efforts to free her brother.

She said the pope assured her that "he would be praying with me, as he does every day, for an end to the conflict in Lebanon and peace and reconciliation for the people there."

She added the Pope John Paul said he would pray "for not only Terry Anderson but all of the hostages."

Mrs. Say recalled to the pope how another American hostage, a Catholic priest, the Rev. Lawrence Martin Jenco, had celebrated Mass for Anderson using bits of dried bread and water instead of wine. Anderson had pulled fibers from his floor mat and made rosaries for the two of them, she told the pontiff.

Father Jenco was freed in 1986 after nearly 19 months as a hostage and was received by the pope before returning to the United States.

After the audience, Mrs. Say met with reporters before heading to the next stop on her tour, the European Parliament's Committee on Human Rights in Strasbourg, France.

Seventeen other Western hostages—seven Americans, four Britons, two West Germans, two Swiss, an Italian and an Irishman—are being held in Lebanon.

Mrs. Say showed Pope John Paul a photo of Anderson's daughter, Sulome, who was born several months after he was taken hostage, and an older daugher, Gabrielle, now 14.

Larry Heinzerling, who has been serving as a special assistant to AP President and General Manager Louis D. Boccardi on the Anderson case, also attended the audience.

Before coming to Rome, Mrs. Say and AP executives met with the International Committee of the Red Cross in Geneva, Switzerland.

They will also meet with the archbishop of Canterbury, Robert Runcie, in London, UNESCO Director General Federico Mayor in Paris and Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa in Damascus.

The group also hopes to meet with Palestine Liberation Organization Chief Yasser Arafat.

Mrs. Say, who now lives in Cadiz, KY, has said efforts to meet with Iranian officials received no response. Sheik Mohammed Hussein Fadlallah, spiritual head of Hezbollah, the pro-Iranian Shiite Muslim movement in Lebanon, declined to meet with the group outside Lebanon.

Anderson is being held by a group calling itself Islamic Jihad or Islamic Holy War, generally believed to be one of several groups operating under the umbrella of Hezbollah.

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 18, 1990]

ARAFAT MEETS PEGGY SAY

TUNIS.—Palestine Liberation Organization leader Yasser Arafat promised the sister of American hostage Terry Anderson that he will do his "very best" to help free Anderson and the other 17 Westerners held in Lebanon.

The PLO chairman met for an hour with Anderson's sister, Peggy Say, in the dining room of his well-guarded mansion overlooking the Mediterranean in the Tunisian capital, where the PLO has its headquarters.

"I am doing my very best to get the hostages released," he told Say. "I shall continue to do this because I consider it my duty. With the fanantical groups holding them, it is not an easy task. But I promise you that I will do my utmost."

AIRLINE ISSUES

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I was recently honored to participate in a local radio production called Capital Commentary, which airs on WGMS-FM. This radio station runs "Capital Commentary" from Members of Congress as a public service to its listeners. I commend WGMS for offering this opportunity to address important subjects.

I would like to submit for the RECORD a transcript of my comments for the "Capital Commentary" Program.

CAPITAL COMMENTARY

This is South Dakota Senator Larry Pressler.

I serve as a member of the United States Senate Transportation Committee, and airlines are a major topic before us in 1990.

The issue of air safety affects everyone who flies. Also, the issue of ticket pricing and the growing monopolies in the American airline system are a great concern to us on the committee.

The issue of foreign ownership of some of our airlines must be faced. Also, the average traveler is very concerned about ticket prices. Now, it's true that you can get a very good deal on airline ticket prices if you can plan far in advance and buy a Super Saver. But if you suddenly have to go to an event, a funeral, or a business engagement, for example, that you can only plan a few days in advance, you can be stuck with paying very high airline tickets.

There's also a problem with the small airports in places such as South Dakota where we do not have a hub airport. I am a strong supporter of the Essential Air Service Program to help out those smaller town areas.

Then there's the issue of airport congestion at airports for airplanes and the gridlock of just getting to and from airports.

We have many challenges in our society and in the Senate Transportation Committee to address in 1990 regarding air service for our citizens.

This is Senator Larry Pressler for "Capital Commentary."

MARGARET CHASE SMITH

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, a very wise man once noted that youth is not a time of life—it is a state of mind. There is no one who better personifies this adage than a great lady from the State of Maine. I am referring, of course, to our former colleague, Senator Margaret Chase Smith.

At the age of 92, there seems to be nothing that the youthful spirit of Senator Smith cannot undertake. Not long ago she climbed aboard a Ski-Doo 486 snowmobile for a ride with her niece in the frigid Maine winter. She travels frequently, tends to the Margaret Chase Smith Library in her beloved Skowhegan, keeps up with volumes of correspondence and lectures frequently.

An article detailing many of the activities of this remarkable woman appeared recently in the Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call. I am sure it will be of interest to my Senate colleagues and I ask that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEISTY EX-SENATOR MARGARET CHASE SMITH, 92, IS STILL RIDING SNOWMOBILES, FOLLOWING POLITICS

(By Karen Foerstel)

In 1948, she became the first woman to be elected to both Houses of Congress. Sixteen years later, she was the first woman to have her name placed in nomination for president at the convention of a major party.

And today, at the age of 92, former Sen. Margaret Chase Smith (R-Maine) is again making headlines, this time not for her political moves but for her maneuvering on a snowmobile.

Just two weeks ago, Smith, who celebrated her 92nd birthday this past Dec. 14, braved 15-degree Maine temperatures, hopped onto the back of a Ski-Doo 486 with her niece, and was off to the hills for a day of snowmobiling.

"It hit the papers for some reason," Smith said in a telephone interview from her home in Skowhegan, Maine, on Monday. "I don't know what I did."

Smith, who lives on her own in the house she designed 40 years ago, first came to public attention in 1940 when she was elected to fill the vacancy left by her husband, Rep. Clyde Smith (R-Maine), who had died suddenly of a heart attack.

Urged by her husband's friends to run for the seat, the 42-year-old widow won easily.

"I never had any dream of such a thing," Smith said of her unexpected entrance into the political arena. "But I had his business to take care of."

After serving a quiet six years in the House, Smith was told by a friend that she had "reached her peak" in politics and had no place to go but "downhill."

It was this statement, Smith says, that made her determined to move in the opposite direction. Forty-one years ago, Smith was elected to the US Senate.

In 1950, as a freshman, she delivered her now-famous "Declaration of Conscience" speech on the Senate floor, denouncing the tactics of her colleague Sen. Joe McCarthy (R-Wis).

"I think if I go down in history, it would be for that," Smith said in her soft and shakey voice. "It called attention . . . as to how serious this was. He was attacking educators, politicians . . . everybody."

Smith's speech placed her on the McCarthy hit-list. His first act of retaliation, as ranking minority member of the Executive Expenditures (now Government Operations) Committee, was to kick Smith off the subcommittee on permanent investigations and replace her with newly elected Sen. Richard Milhous Nixon (R-Calif).

Six years later, Smith was chosen by her party to debate Eleanor Roosevelt, FDR's widow, on "Face the Nation" during the Eisenhower/Stevenson presidential race.

And in 1964, Smith announced her own candidacy for the Republican presidential nomination, saying, "Because of these very impelling reasons against my running, I have decided that I shall enter the New Hampshire Presidential preferential primary and the Illinois primary."

Today, Smith is still fighting the odds. In November she overcame a bout with food poisoning which hospitalized her for eight days.

She's now back at full speed, attending local political functions, lecturing to community groups, and "giving a good many interviews."

She still stays in touch with several current Members of Congress—although she declined to mention any names—and keeps up with the latest news from Washington.

Regarding the Congressional salary increase: "There are too many other things to do than worry about a pay raise," she says. The top salary she made while on the Hill, she recalls, was about $22,500.

Regarding ethics: "I think ethics cannot be legislated. People either have ethics or they don't."

While she no longer drives, she still owns her own car and hires a driver to take her to political and community gatherings.

Two weeks ago, she attended a "big party" for the Speaker of the Maine House and days later took part in a Chinese New Year celebration.

"I don't miss [Congress] because I'm keeping so busy here," she said.

Smith spends most of the day working in the Margaret Chase Smith Library—built adjacent to her house in 1982—sorting through her thousands of papers and files of her political career.

Another chunk of her time is spent personally answering the 40 pieces of mail she receives daily.

Many of the letters are from people who think that Smith—who was defeated for reelection in 1972 by Democrat William Hathaway—is still serving the Congress.

"So many people don't realize I'm no longer in the Senate, asking me to do things for them."

LANDMARK JUSTICE

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, during his long and distinguished tenure on the U.S. Supreme Court, Justice William Brennan has made many significant contributions to America's understanding of the Constitution's promise of equal justice under law. Some of these—such as Justice Brennan's historic opinions on libel law, due process, voting rights, equal rights for women, and the separation of church and state—received widespread public attention when they were announced and are well known to many Americans. But his important judicial pronouncements on the subject of land use have not received the attention they deserve.

That situation has now been corrected by Landmark Justice, a new book by Charles M. Haar, Brandeis professor of law at Harvard Law School, and Jerold S. Kayden, a Guggenheim fellow and visiting faculty member at the Lincoln Institute of Land Policy in Cambridge, MA. Professors Haar and Kayden have produced a thorough and insightful analysis of Justice Brennan's opinions on many important land use questions, from his service on the New Jersey courts and on the U.S. Supreme Court. As the authors demonstrate, Justice Brennan's rulings on these issues reflect his deep-seated conviction that the Constitution embodies a fundamental vision of human dignity, protected from Government interference.

Professors Haar and Kayden have added a new dimension to our appreciation of Justice Brennan's profound impact on American life and law, and I commend their study to my colleagues in Congress.

MAINE ACADIAN CULTURE PRESERVATION COMMISSION

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, for more than 200 years, Acadian settlers and their descendants have greatly contributed to the culture, history, and growth of Maine. Sadly, this culture, grounded in its strong commitment to family, religion, hard work, and sacrifice is in danger of being lost.

Last year, I introduced legislation along with my colleague, Senator COHEN, to preserve Maine's Acadian culture. The legislation, S. 1756, would establish a Maine Acadian Culture Preservation Commission to advise the National Park Service on how to conduct activities and programs to interpret the story of Maine's Acadian settlers and their descendents as well as preserving and perpetuating Acadian music, arts, crafts, and folklore.

An article in the November edition of Down East magazine demonstrates the clear need for this legislation.

The article describes the efforts of Ida Roy, who has made her life's work preserving Acadian folk songs. Along with performing these songs at festivals around Maine, Ida Roy has collected and taped hundreds of these songs with the assitance of Roger Paradis, a historian and folklorist at the University of Maine at Fort Kent.

Those tapes are now kept in a suitcase in Ida Roy's home. They deserve to be archived and made more readily available to an interested public. That is precisely the goal of my legislation.

Without the enactment of S. 1756, it is likely that the history and culture of the Acadian people, who have lived in this country and the State of Maine for more than 200 years, will be effectively lost to the ages.

That should not be allowed to happen. As Ida Roy knows, the culture and history of Maine's Acadian people deserves to be celebrated and preserved before it is lost to future generations, in the words of Down East, "to the clamor of American mass media."

I hope that will be accomplished through enactment of this legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that the November Down East article on Ida Roy be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VOICE OF THE VALLEY

(By Ernie Freeberg)

It's a long way from Van Buren to Portland, a good seven hours on the road. But every August a small, unassuming woman named Ida Roy makes the trip down to the Maine Festival to represent the St. John Valley on the festival's folk arts stage. "I am so proud to do it," she says. As she steps up to perform, the lifelong Aroostook resident is dwarfed by the stage and awkward behind a microphone, as unsure of electronics as she is of the English language. But she has a big voice with an edge of brass, strong enough to hold its own against the surrounding din of the festival, stirring enough to hold the audience spellbound. Some of the Acadian songs she sings have, in fact, been holding audiences spellbound for centuries.

Before each new song she offers a translation in halting English for the non-Acadians in the audience. One is a tragic love song about a dying bride who asks her lover to bury her in a white dress, diamonds, and roses. Another tells the tale of a solidier who went off to the Seven Years' War and returned to find his wife remarried. To lighten the mood, she sings a comic song about a man who sells his girlfriend's wig to buy drink. Then she offers one with a message: against her father's wishes, a girl marries a drunkard. Before long the girl runs away, and her family finds her frozen to death one morning on their doorstep. "That's something true," Ida explains. "My mother used to sing that a lot to us children and she would say 'listen carefully.' "

At sixty-eight, Ida is the only one in the Valley still singing many of the old songs; but she is doing her best to see that others will at least get a chance to hear them. Somewhere in Ida Roy's Van Buren apartment she's hiding what she calls "the big treasury of the St. John Valley"—a suitcase overflowing with cassette tapes, 240 at last count. Each tape is full of Ida's songs, recorded on her home cassette recorder, wrapped in tinfoil for safekeeping, then hidden away, protected for posterity. "As long as the house don't burn down they are safe for sure," she says in a melodic Acadian accent. "They're valuable now because I think I'm the only one that's got them."

Until her retirement a few years ago, Ida turned her kitchen job at the local rectory into a daily concert. And now, with more time to spare, she practices her songs each day and never misses a chance to share them. "I don't advertise, but if anybody asks, I don't turn them down."

Ida's suitcase notwithstanding, Ida's songs belong to the whole St. John Valley, where they've been passed down from one generation to the next ever since the first French settlers arrived in the late 1700s. Ironically, they have become Ida's "treasure" simply because most of her neighbors no longer want them. Not so long ago, just about everyone in the Valley knew at least a few of the old tunes, most could sing along at the informal kitchen parties known as soirees, and every village had its master singers who knew hundreds of songs by heart. "I've been questioning all the people I meet around here," says Ida, "and no one has some songs anymore."

That may be the exaggeration of a fanatic folksong collector. The fact is Ida's secret suitcase holds close to a thousand songs. The first few hundred she inherited from her parents, handed down like family heirlooms. The rest she coaxed out of her neighbors, or found by combing the local history shelves of Valley libraries. "I used to sing for the nursing homes and the old people, they sang along with me. And once in a while someone had a song or two I didn't have yet." With a mixture of sorrow and scorn she adds, "But the young people, they don't have anything like that. They don't have one."

Ida stands on the brink of a generation gap that will leave an enduring mark on the valley's cultural life. For most of their history, the Acadians were too busy trying to wrest a living from the soil to have much time for formal education, and so they used songs and stories, not the written word, to pass on their history, customs, and language. But now, in a single generation, centuries of oral traditions are about to be lost, the old Acadian voices drowned out by the clamor of the American mass media. "My children, they don't want to learn the songs. All they sing is what's on the radio," says Ida. "It really bothers me that nobody will take after my father and me."

Ida gives her father much of the credit for her own passion for French music. "He was singing all the time," she recalls, and of the hundreds of songs she learned from him she says "he knew all of them by heart; he didn't have one written down, not one."

Ida also inherited her father's strong voice, a talent that earned her the honor as a schoolgirl of leading the class in a round of "American songs" every morning. But it was the French songs Ida loved. "They didn't come from the radio, only from the people around. And every little song that I could find, I'd pick it up."

When Ida's father wasn't singing, he was working—traveling around Aroostook County as a lumber-mill mechanic, running a shingle mill and blacksmith shop, and supervising the family farm in St. Agatha, with lots of help from Ida and her sister. "We worked on the farm like men," she says, "feeding the animals, harvesting the buckwheat; whatever had to be done, we did."

That work, and the long winter walk to school in the days before girls wore pants, were the reasons Ida quit school in the sixth grade. But each night when the chores were done the family gathered in the parlor and Ida's musical education continued. "Of course there was no television. My dad had a radio, but he was saving his battery for the news. So instead I was crocheting and singing all the time. That's the way we learned."

Ida also learned at family soirees. Relatives from all over the Valley converged on a single farmhouse for a long evening of singing, card playing, story-telling, and dancing. "We were a crowd," she laughs, adding without a trace of irony that "it was just like the old times we see sometime on TV." She remembers her relatives piling into three or four horse-drawn sleighs at the end of an all-night song swap in Daigle, driving across frozen potato fields, not arriving back in St. Agatha till daybreak.

The songs Ida picked up at those soirees are like beautiful beach stones, ancient and worn smooth by the endless handling of time. Many in her repertoire have been passed down from parent to child for centuries. These are the love songs Ida's great-grandparents probably courted to, the tragic ballads with moral lessons every Acadian mother hoped to sing into her children's conscience, and the humorous ditties that helped pass long hours in potato fields and lumber camps.

These ballads have lasted so long because they relate the timeless tales of lost love, war, and tragedy every generation wants to hear. But embedded in them like fossils are historical references that date some all the way back to the Middle Ages. The songs were brought to the Valley by the first Acadian settlers. A long way from France and surrounded by inhospitable Englishmen, they became extreme cultural conservatives; while language and culture marched on in the rest of the world, the Acadians isolated in St. John Valley managed to stop the clock. That's why to this day they speak a dialect full of 300-year-old idioms; and that's why Ida still sings about Napoleon, the Seven Years' War, and Indian ambushes.

Not all of Ida's songs are antiques. Within her lifetime Acadian songwriters were still recording local history through long plaintive ballads called complaints, songs about what Ida calls "a tragedy that really happened." For example, she sings a complaint about the death of her brother-in-law, Wilfred Roy: as a young lumberjack he fell to his death in a woods accident. "He was supposed to come home the very next morning but late that night he fell from a big pile of logs and broke his neck on the bobsled," Ida remembers. "His cousin Alsime Madore saw everything that happened, and had to go tell my husband who was asleep in the camp, that his brother had died. Madore came out from the woods and while he was planting potatoes that spring he was thinking of what he saw there and decided to compose a song about it."

Madore wrote the song for the victim's family and friends, to help them remember the event and to express their grief. Like many complaints, it ends with an apology: Madore admits he wrote it, then asks the listener to forgive him if he failed to do justice to the subject. That kind of humility is common among the Valley's Acadians. Ida herself will sometimes apologize for the songs she loves. "Songs that educated people sing you see right away it's not Acadian, that they learned it in school somewhere. In the Acadian songs the words are not always grammatical and sometimes the words don't go with the air too well." But Ida is proud enough of the tradition never to correct what she collects. "I like a song the way it is because that's the way they wrote it."

In spite of the fact that her children complained about her constant singing, and her late husband had "no voice, no talent except to work real hard for a living," Ida stuck with the old songs. But it wasn't until 1972 that Roger Paradis, a historian and folklorist from the University of Maine in Fort Kent, launched her on the song-collecting spree that has since filled a suitcase. Paradis, who also grew up in the Valley, realized that the old songs and stories were an endangered species and that most people who knew them were "either in the grave or the nursing home." So with the help of his students, he began to collect the Valley's songs on tape, and his inquiries soon led him to Ida Roy. For several months Ida spent Friday evenings at the university, taping her entire musical memory for the archives.

When Paradis started the collection twenty years ago, there were lots of others in the Valley who knew as many or more of the old songs. But, as Paradis predicted, most are gone now, and he says, "At this point Ida is probably unique; you would be hard put nowadays to find anyone else still singing the old ballads this way."

Since her children and fellow Acadians seem uninterested in carrying on the tradition, Ida realizes she will probably be the Valley's last ballad singer. Far from shrinking under the burden, she has launched herself with missionary zeal into the effort to set these songs down for future generations. That means lots of investigative work in local nursing homes and libraries, and in the back rooms of her own memory. "Just the other day one came back to me in a flash and I ran to write it down," Ida says. "It was a song no one has heard except in the old days."

Ida Roy would like to see her personal song collection out of the suitcase and into print; and so, at the age of sixty-three, she's contemplating going back to school for some typing and French classes, so she can publish her own songbooks. "I'll need more education since I want to make a good job on that," she says. "I'm nearly too old to go back to school but I've got a good courage so I'll keep singing and writing and we'll see what happens."

THE FIGHT AGAINST WORLD HUNGER: A STRATEGY FOR THE 1990'S

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, as we launch the 1990's with well-founded hope and expectations about changes in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, I believe it is important to reflect that in other places, the outlook is not nearly as promising. Hunger and poverty continue to plague many parts of Africa, Latin America, and South Asia, and our attempts to overcome these problems have been grossly inadequate.

The last decade was not kind to the world's poorest, hungriest nations. Famine, war, and civil strife have strangled the food supply of entire regions. Yet the 1980's also saw encouraging developments in understanding the root of this problem, which has led to progress in providing emergency aid, combating childhood and nutritional diseases, and the emergence of grassroots development groups. Our challenge in the 1990's is to build upon these small successes.

With that goal in mind, in November 1989, hunger experts from 14 countries met in Bellagio, Italy, to analyze the problem of world hunger and to offer a remedy. The group concluded that half of the world's hungry people could have reliable access to sufficient food by the end of the next decade. Their conference document, the Bellagio Declaration, lays out four steps to that achievable goal.

At Brown University in Providence, RI, the Alan Shawn Feinstein World Hunger Program is actively engaged in the fight against hunger; it played a crucial role in coordinating and developing the Bellagio initiative. I believe that this document warrants our serious consideration as we move forward in charting our course in the decade ahead. I recommend the Bellagio Declaration to my colleagues and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the declaration was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BELLAGIO DECLARATION: OVERCOMING HUNGER IN THE 1990'S

(The Bellagio Declaration was produced and adopted by a group of 23 planners, practitioners, opinion leaders and scientists meeting at the Rockefeller Foundation Study and Conference Center in Bellagio, Italy, on November 13-16, 1989. Participants came from 14 countries, both north and south. They are affiliated with 9 national or international agencies, 8 advocacy and grassroots organizations and 5 universities and research institutes, but participated as individuals sharing their expertise and concern. The Declaration reflects the content of the original background document for the meeting and the views expressed in different rounds of discussion during the conference. It represents the consensus emerging at the meeting but not necessarily the individual views of each participant. A list of all participants is attached.)

It is possible to end half the world's hunger before the year 2000. We have only imprecise numbers to take measure of the hungry, but those numbers tell us that: (1) a billion people live in households too poor to obtain the food they need for work; (2) half of those are too poor even to obtain the food they need to maintain minimal activity; (3) one child in six is born underweight and one in three is underweight by age 5; and (4) hundreds of millions of people suffer anemia, goiter, and impaired sight from diets with too little iron, iodine or vitamin A. In a world of potential food plenty, we have collectively failed more than one billion of our people.

Hunger wears many faces. It may be acute or chronic, visible or hidden, food or disease related, but it is typically rooted in poverty and in the economic and social processes that perpetuate it. The elimination of hunger, therefore, is formidable and a long term undertaking. Recognizing this, we still believe that reducing hunger by half in the 1990's is a realistic objective for the world. We can act meaningfully to end hunger in the short run without losing sight of the continuing need in the long run to address its basic causes.

The decade now ending has been described as "the lost 80's," a time when efforts to overcome hunger have been grossly inadequate in the face of deteriorating economic conditions in Africa and Latin America, persistent hunger in South Asia, and increased incidences of hunger in wealthy countries. Overall, the 1980's has been a period of growing realization that most development efforts have failed the hungry and poor in the Third World and that current uses of natural resources are unsustainable. Less visible, but more encouraging trends in the 80's include a fresh understanding of the origins and causes of hunger, lessons learned from recent attempts to improve nutrition, the evolution of a worldwide logistical system to provide emergency food aid, rapid progress against childhood and nutritional diseases, and the maturation of grassroots movements and development groups.

As we turn into the 1990's the world is in great ferment. Fears of imminent worldwide economic collapse have abated. Peace and effects for peace are emerging in all regions of the world. In many countries, both industrialized and developing, a wave of democratization, participation, and pluralism is evident. On the other hand, unequal trade relations between the North and the South, growing and already heavy debt burdens, environmental degradation, and continued rapid population growth make life miserable and particularly difficult for poor people in Third World countries.

It is against this background of new opportunity and persistent problems that organizations—governmental, intergovernmental and nongovernmental—concerned with hunger have begun to identify needed directions for the 1990's and to propose new initiatives for public action. Specifically, the Bellagio Declaration proposes four achievable goals for the 1990's.

ACHIEVABLE GOALS

We believe that it is possible and imperative in the 1990's (1) to eliminate deaths from famine, (2) to end hunger in half of the poorest households, (3) to cut malnutrition in half for mothers and small children, and (4) to eradicate iodine and vitamin A deficiencies. Together, they comprise a comprehensive yet still practical program that can end half of world hunger in the 1990's.

These goals are achievable because they build on the best experiences with programs and policies for overcoming world hunger. The most promising ones are those that empower people to assess their own condition and to act in their own behalf, that provide short-term hunger relief while addressing deeply-rooted causes, and that can be sustained over the long term.

1. ELIMINATE FAMINE DEATHS

An attainable target by the year 2000 is the virtual elimination of deaths due to famine among the 15 to 35 million people at risk of famine in any year through improvement of early warning and response systems and international efforts to provide safe passage of food in zones of armed conflict.

Many of the tools needed to prevent deaths due to famine are already in place. Efforts to cope with drought, flood, war and famine in the 1980's have led to major improvements in the global system for providing emergency food aid. Some developing countries have created early-response mechanisms to take advantage of early warnings. Continued effort must be made to improve these programs by taking into account local indicators of increased vulnerability among groups at particular risk.

Another achievement growing out of experience with the famines of the 1980's is the widespread awareness of the need for relating short-term relief measures to longer term development objectives. Although emergency food aid often is the most critical intervention, agencies and organizations engaged in famine relief now know that they need to couple it with measures to reduce dependency on such aid and to promote self-reliance.

The major obstacle to eliminating famine remains the destruction or interdiction of civilian food supplies in zones of armed conflict. The rudiments for international protection of civilian rights to food exist in international law, most specifically in the 1977 protocols to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 that prohibit starvation of civilians as a means of combat. More recently, there is renewed interest in an international or regional covenant for the sanctity of civilian food supplies and the safe passage of emergency food relief. Such a covenant could bind nations to provide safe passege and might permit convoy by United Nations peacekeeping forces within their national territory.

2. END HUNGER IN ONE-HALF THE POOREST HOUSEHOLDS

Also attainable is the goal of augmenting purchasing power and food production levels so as to enable half the hungry people in the world to buy or grow enough to eat.

For many poor farmers in the Third World, a key need is maintaining access to the natural resource base and the inputs needed for cultivating, herding, or fishing in the face of growing population and increased competition for land. Increasingly, poor households have had to cope with the deterioration of their resources, the loss of crucial access to common resources, and restriction to all but the most ecologically marginal land. The task of rehabilitating degraded ecosystems and restoring to the most vulnerable groups their access and control of productive resources of land, forest, and water must be accelerated. A variety of sustainable agricultural and forestry techniques with demonstrated ability to sustain productivity, provide fuelwood, limit soil erosion, and increase food and income can also be applied.

Measures to increase small farm agricultural production and to create new income and work activities could end hunger for a third to a half of the roughly 450 million people who now live in rural households too poor to minimally feed themselves. Programs that provide wage and food income in return for labor to construct needed agricultural infrastructure and to restore degraded resources show particular promise. They reduce poverty in the short run through direct supplementation of incomes and in the long run through sustained increases in agricultural productivity and income. Programs that have provided self-sustaining sources of credit to start small businesses or produce local products and services, especially for women, have also proven quite effective in many countries.

Food-security programs, given targeting and effective application, could by the end of the decade end hunger for half or more of the 150 million people in urban households too poor to minimally feed themselves in present circumstances. There is widespread agreement that untargeted food assistance, carried out by means of price control, overvalued exchange rates, import controls, or cash subsidies is ineffective or cannot be sustained because of its high costs. Yet ample experience with food-security programs demonstrates that careful targeting can be accomplished by subsidizing foods that are consumed primarily by the poor and by distributing food and coupons in poor neighborhoods and to vulnerable groups such as mothers and children. The use of existing marketing networks to distribute food can often lower costs and improve participation. Community-organized mass feeding programs are also effective, low-cost ways to target and distribute food.

3. CUT MALNUTRITION AMONG WOMEN AND CHILDREN IN HALF

Women of reproductive age and children under five years of age are particularly vulnerable to malnutrition. Although many of the measures listed above will help improve their situation in the decade to come, special measures are still needed to reduce their special vulnerabilities. Sustained breastfeeding, expanded supplemental feeding, and growth monitoring, in combination with limiting the effects of childhood illness, could reduce by half the common forms of childhood wasting and stunting. The prevalence of breastfeeding is stable or even increasing in many developing countries, perhaps assisted by continuing efforts to encourage and maintain it. Innovative programs that combine monitoring of child growth through regular weighing to detect wasting with supplemental feeding hold promise to address the weight loss of children with recurrent bouts of illness and the difficult weaning transition from breast to the adult diet.

Many such initiatives for the benefit of children place an increased burden on already overworked mothers, even though they may be somewhat compensated by the reduced care required of healthy children. Community-based programs that include child-care and other supports can lessen this burden while enhancing mothers' efforts. Reducing by at least half through iron supplements the nutritional anemia endemic in women of reproductive age can further strengthen mothers. Continued promotion of improved birth spacing will benefit both children and mothers.

4. ERADICATE IODINE AND VITAMIN A DEFICIENCIES

Through the use of current techniques, most of the 190 million cases of goiter could be eradicated and the 280 million children at risk of vitamin A deficiency protected by the end of the century. Selected regions and countries have made major progress in eliminating iodine deficiency disorders—marked by goiter, mental impairment, and, in the extreme, cretinism—and the visual impairment of vitamin A deficiency diseases. For goiter, most countries can provide iodized salt to most areas endemic with the disease and injections of iodized oil for inhabitants of more remote mountain and desert regions. For vitamin A deficiency, a capsule taken two or three times a year can protect a child throughout the critical ages of one to four years. Evidence is also increasing for wide-ranging health benefits beyond eye protection from vitamin A therapy.

STRATEGIES AND RESOURCES

Any strategy to overcome hunger in the 1990's must be conceived and implemented in full awareness of the array of fundamental changes and trends that will characterize the coming decade and shape the context in which hunger persists. Indeed, if we fail to relate efforts to end hunger to these broader forces—which represent both obstacles and opportunities—short-term gains may well be swamped by long-term increases in hunger.

The outstanding situation that must be recognized as we move into the 1990's is the inequitable economic relationship between the North and the South, which withdraws net capital from the South, diverts agriculture in developing countries from producing food to meet local needs, creates contentious food trade barriers, underprices food commodities, and often encourages capital investment that undermines rather than advances sustainable uses of agriculture and resources.

No less challenging than the worldwide economic picture is the precarious state of the global environment. Deforestation, desertification, soil erosion, water shortage and salinization, chemical contamination, and global warming will adversely affect the sustainable food production capacity of the planet. But embedded in this threat is also an opportunity. Worldwide attention, from heads of state to the general public, is now strongly focused on the endangered planet. We who combat hunger must put a human face on the environmental issue: unless we restore and maintain viable ecosystems and ecological cycles, we will increasingly threaten our ability to feed humanity. Opponents of hunger must embrace their environmentalist allies in a common cause.

Exacerbating the environment/hunger problem is the continued growth of the world's population. During the 1990's, the world will need to feed another billion mouths, most living in the very countries where the ability to curb hunger is already severely strained. Family planning programs that have slowed the overall rate of population growth in the world must persist and expand with international support to reduce the vulnerability of the poor to hunger and famine.

A particularly welcome evolution has been the rapid chain of events in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. This has reduced tension between the East and the West and opens up new opportunities for trade and investments. These opportunities for cooperation on a global scale should be used to strengthen North-South cooperation as well. For instance, a social compact might be agreed upon whereby funds that become available through reduction of East-West arms expenditures would be used to assist both Eastern Europe and the South.

From the perspective of these anticipated global trends, what then are the strategies to overcome hunger that will be most effective?

Particularly important is the creation of new opportunities for the hungry themselves, together with their leaders, advocates, mass movements, and local organizations and resources. In this context, it is especially important to empower women who grow most of the Third World's food and feed its families. More needs to be known about the full development potential of the wide range of non-governmental organizations, especially for the multiplication and aggregation of grassroots initiatives and the advocacy of needs and interests of people who normally find no way of expressing their demands through formal government channels. But much more needs to be done even by well-intentioned governments and aid agencies to incorporate into their modes of operation greater sensitivity to modes of participation that enable people to act on their own behalf.

Although many governments in developing countries are under severe financial pressure and often lack capacity to implement extensive programs, they must play a growing role in a renewed effort to combat hunger. Decisions to decentralize responsibility to lower echelons of administration and to local government institutions or to use the distributional capacity of the market that gained momentum in the 1980's must continue. Such local level agencies can play a major role in developing and restoring necessary rural infrastructure and services. To make these investments worthwhile, however, governments must also take important steps toward the creation of an enabling environment in which citizens and their organizations can make more effective contributions to overcoming hunger.

Finally, an achievable reduction in hunger in the 1990's will require substantial new financial resources above and beyond the maintenance of current levels of donor and national support. The costs of the achievable goals range from a high of $25 per person to provide famine relief or to build rural infrastructure through food-for-work programs to 57¢ per person to provide the vitamin A and iodine supplementation needed to prevent blindness and goiter. Much of these costs are already partly met in current national and international expenditures. Thus, a realistic program to combat hunger in the 1990's might require U.S. $5 to 10 billion per year in new or reallocated funds.

The most common source proposed for additional resources is a substantial reduction in the annual military expenditures, currently nearly U.S. $1 trillion worldwide, as great power rivalry and conflict diminish and serious efforts are made to resolve regional disputes. A reduction of one percent in these annual expenditures could more than fund a comprehensive program to overcome hunger in the 1990's. Additional food aid, if properly used, can not only meet emergency needs in extreme deficit situations, but when carefully marketed, can provide new sources of funds for local initiatives. Other new sources of funds could include the "swapping" of actions against hunger in exchange for outstanding debts, the redirection of existing development expenditures by identifying poor people rather than poor countries as the relevant target of interventions, and the linking of efforts to overcome hunger with those to improve health care, enhance poor people's access to productive resources, and promote sustainable environmental development.

Although the objectives of the program to end half the world's hunger before the year 2000 are global, strategic emphasis will differ between regions and countries. In sub-Saharan Africa priority may be given to strengthening early-response systems to famine, including exploration of an accord, sanctioned by the Organization of Africa Unity, on safe passage for relief supplies; targeted support for increased production by the poor, including efforts to control pests that significantly reduce harvests and stored food; and efforts to break the disease-undernutrition nexus. In Asia, where the food problem is often less a matter of production than redistribution, priority may be given to restoring and increasing access and control by the poor of necessary resources and to encouraging development strategies that are socially just and environmentally sustainable. In Latin America priority may be given to alleviating the disproportionate share of the debt burden that is currently carried by wage earners and the self-employed in the informal sector; reforming food systems so that they better meet the needs of vulnerable groups of women, urban poor, indigenous populations, and small farm households; and improving the health and nutrition infrastructure to enable governments and other organizations to meet the targets for mothers and children and for the major nutritional deficiency diseases.

CALL FOR ACTION

An ambitious program to attack hunger in the 1990's requires most of all the mobilization of public support for this cause both in developed and developing countries. In most of these, the hungry and the poor do not have natural allies in their governments. Their needs are considered and their voices heard only to the extent that they are mobilized into their own organizations or that their cause is adopted by others. The last decade has witnessed a slow emergence of new public voices for the hungry and impoverished in rich countries based in churches, development organizations, and populist groups. Such groups have mobilized constituencies for the hungry, utilized the mass media, and developed long-term relationships with governments wherever appropriate. In developing countries, opportunities for influence have been different. Mass media and lobbying efforts have been less important than efforts by religious and political organizations. These emerging voices need to be strengthened, particularly in countries where the voices of the hungry are faint.

Faced with potentially competitive concerns, the call for ending hunger must be strengthened. But the clarity of the message needs to be strengthened as well, reminding constituencies of the enormity of the need, creating alternatives between the acceptance of hunger as always with us and the postponement of action until the world can be set fully right, and weighing in with promise on the fine balance between hope and despair. Pragmatic as well as altruistic arguments need to be used. The billion hungry people are effectively outside of markets for anything but the lowest-valued foodstuffs. It is in the long-term interests of economies that live by trade to help those households move beyond the threshold of hunger. By placing political leaders at all levels under constructive pressure to consider overcoming hunger as both an achievable goal and an inescapable concern of the 1990's, individuals and organizations can make a lasting contribution toward the emergence of a new political vision and a renewal of social energy to ensure places at the table for the hungry of the world.

For the first time in human history, the end of famine is achievable. The worst forms of hunger in both rural and urban areas can be halved. Most nations, even poor ones, could provide for the minimum nutritional needs of mothers and children. Goiter can be relegated to a glandular disorder of the few rather than the iodine-starvation of the many. Blindness can be prevented in the 42 million children with vitamin A deficiency. A focused attack on these four faces of hunger—drawing on new resources and combining the better and best of efforts that have worked well for the poor—can end half the world's hunger over the next decade.

ILO CONVENTION (NO. 160) CONCERNING LABOR STATISTICS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent to modify the agreement on the ILO convention as follows:

I ask unanimous consent that the committee-recommended declaration be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Hearing to objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I thank my colleagues and especially my two very distinguished colleagues, the Republican leader and the President pro tempore, for their cooperation in this matter.

I yield the floor.

RECESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 12:30 having arrived, the Senate will now stand in recess until the hour of 2:15 p.m. today.

Thereupon, at 12:32 p.m., the Senate recessed until 2:15 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. SANFORD].

EXECUTIVE SESSION

ILO CONVENTION (NO. 160) CONCERNING LABOR STATISTICS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now go into executive session to consider Executive Calendar No. 8, International Labor Conference Convention Concerning Labor Statistics.

The convention has been advanced through its various parliamentary stages to the presentation of the resolution of ratification, on which there shall be 1 hour of debate to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

The clerk will report the resolution of ratification.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of a Certified Copy of the Convention (No. 160) Concerning Labor Statistics, adopted by the International Labor Conference at Geneva on June 25, 1985.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, today the Senate will take up the International Labor Organization's Convention No. 160 Concerning Labor Statistics.

The purpose of this convention is to call upon all ratifying governments to collect, compile, and publish basic labor statistics in any or all of nine specific subject areas. The U.S. Government already publishes basic labor statistics in all of the areas covered by the convention. Therefore, the convention will not impose any additional burdens on the U.S. Government nor will it alter in any way U.S. labor laws or practices.

The convention has the full support of the AFL-CIO and the U.S. Council for International Business. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of granting advice and consent to the ratification of this convention.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I would like to congratulate the senior Senator from New York [Mr. MOYNIHAN] for the excellent job he has done in chairing the hearings on this convention. Early in his distinguished career, Senator MOYNIHAN did an extensive and comprehensive Ph.D. thesis is on the International Labor Organization and is, in my view, the leading expert on international labor issues in this body. He deserves a great deal of credit for a job well done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from the State of New York.

DECLARATION NO. 1257

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk a declaration and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New York [Mr. MOYNIHAN], proposes a declaration numbered 1257.

Strike the period at the end of the text of the resolution of ratification and add the following language: ", subject to the following declaration:

"There is agreement by the United States Government agencies concerned, the AFL-CIO, and the United States Council for International Business, that each ILO convention will be examined on its merits on a tripartite basis; that if there are any differences between the convention and Federal law and practice, these will be dealt with in the normal legislative process; and that there is no intention to change State law and practice by Federal action through ratification of ILO conventions, and the examination will include possible conflicts between Federal and State law that would be caused by such ratification."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I thank the Presiding Officer for commencing this historic moment, if I may put it so, a moment in which we prepare to consider for only the 10th time in the history of our relations with the International Labor Organization an international labor convention.

I shall return in time, sir, to the declaration that the clerk has just read.

When I speak of this as historic, I mean that in several senses. There is the simple fact of our having moved now to the tenth ILO convention we have considered. But more important, by this action, that I am confident the Senate will take today, we move into a new period in our relations with the ILO; namely, a period in which we are an active participant, not just in the deliberations that lead to labor conventions, but by adopting them as well.

There are more conventions to come. I will note that in our long experience of the ILO, after membership in 1934, we adopted some seven ILO treaties, six of which involved maritime matters which the Congress has always felt a need to legislate on.

After the war, we adopted a purely technical convention which brought the ILO under the United Nations. And then, for a third of a century, nothing, nothing at all. Whereupon we finally resumed consideration of ILO conventions. This will be the third we have considered in 3 years, an event of some importance.

I mentioned, Mr. President, that this is a history that goes a long way back into our national life, and indeed it does.

The League of Nations, which was the subject of such fierce debate on this floor in the fall and winter of 1919-20, came to life somewhat furtively in the clock room of the Quai d'Orsay in Paris in January 1920. The United States itself had convened the meeting as provided by the Treaty of Versailles, but in point of fact the league system had already begun to work here in Washington in October and November of 1919 when the first international labor meeting was held at the Pan American Union Building on Constitution Avenue and the first human rights treaties in the history of the world were adopted.

Not many weeks ago, Mr. President, we had an opportunity to hear an extraordinary address to a joint meeting of the Congress by Lech Walesa, the head of the Solidarity trade movement in Poland, the survival of which very much turned on the fact of Poland's obligation to allow freedom of association under ILO conventions it had agreed to both before and after World War II.

This is an extraordinary organization. It is the part of the league system the United States was least likely to join. The league system consisted of the league itself, the Permanent Court of International Justice, and the ILO. The ILO is the one which we did join and we have been proud members for a great many years, with one interruption, to which I will return.

But at this point, Mr. President, I observe that the distinguished ranking member of the Committee on Foreign Relations is on the floor, and I wonder if he might want to take this opportunity to make an opening statement. I look forward to hearing his views.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, needless to say, the distinguished Senator from New York is always gracious. I have been listening with great interest to his comments.

Mr. President, the convention before us today is not controversial in any sense. That in itself is kind of unusual around this place when it comes to multilateral conventions. In the past there have been problems with the nonshipping conventions, which have constituted the great majority of the international labor organization treaties.

I recall that the distinguished Sam Ervin of North Carolina, who served in this body for so many years, always was careful—and it should always be a major concern in this body, I might add—to make sure that U.S. domestic labor law was not altered by treaty. Sometimes people do not understand why this question is so important. I know the Senator from New York understands what Senator Ervin meant and what I today mean. But that does not appear to be an issue this afternoon with the convention pending before us for the advice and consent of the Senate.

ILO Convention 160 on the publication of labor statistics should not be and is not, so far as this Senator is concerned, controversial. It simply would require the United States and other ratifying parties to collect and compile basic labor statistics in nine different areas, such as average wages and hours for important categories of economic activities, the average earnings for representative occupations, wage and salary structures for the entire national economy, average household income and expenditures, number of annual industrial disputes, and an annual survey of occupational injuries and illnesses.

The point is this, Mr. President. The U.S. Government already collects and compiles and publishes statistics in every one of these nine areas covered by this convention now pending. Since ratification will not require the United States to alter in any way its present laws for labor practices, I have no objection to this convention and in fact, of course, do support it.

What I am concerned about—and I may as well mention this in conclusion—is the failure of other participating governments at times to publish accurate statistics. Falsification of recordkeeping may lead to new labor conventions which create labor procedures based upon this erroneous information, so in the long run this would have a negative effect upon domestic law. I hope that we can do something about that as time goes by. If this convention is to be useful, there must be honesty in compliance by every one of the ratifying parties.

Mr. President, I thank the Chair, and I thank the distinguished Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to agree vigorously with the distinguished and able Senator from North Carolina. The ratification of an ILO convention entails the obligation to comply, and it is fully within our capacity as members of the ILO—labor is represented at its annual conference, business is there, Government is there—to review compliance.

The Senator is entirely correct that these are categories of measurement, quantification, that we comply with in the main. These are in fact labor statistics which we invented. Some persons may not know this, but the first demands of the American labor movement as it began to form, first in the 1830's and then later in the 1870's was that Government keep score on things such as the cost of living, what a family requires to get through the week, a minimum city worker's living standard, and to see if they could find what it cost to have a decent standard of living. They were thinking really of the cities of the North at the time, say, in New York; the trade unions would try to bargain for wages that would equal that amount of money.

Soon after the Civil War, industrialization began in this country, and we established a Bureau of Labor Statistics, before a Department of Labor—long before it. It was meant to measure these things. One of the results, as with the Bureau of the Census, was that American business had much more information about its economy long before any other industrial nation did. It is one of the reasons we grew so well. We could measure; we could count. As a rule you never do anything about a subject until you learn to measure it, and we have learned, and the world has learned from us.

But I think the Senator would agree that if we are going to speak with authority during international trade disputes, agreements, negotiations, it is very important for the United States to know what wage levels are in competing nations and what industrial disputes take place there and the levels of compensation and social insurance. Wages and hours, these are the basic numbers of productivity.

We will have this information, if those nations which ratify this convention comply. We will now have ratified. We can ask them to ratify. If they do not, there is bound to be a reason. If they do ratify, they have to keep accurate statistics.

It is important to know how far back our history with the ILO goes. One of the great demands of the working people in France, Britain and the United States during the First World War, was that after the war there be some attention paid to the fact that labor standards were often the victim of international trade. That is the basic theory of the labor convention—to prevent an employer from saying "I would like to pay you 50 cents an hour, but I have to compete with the Belgians, and they pay 40 cents an hour, so I am sorry."

The ILO never adopted a minimum wage convention, but here in Washington in 1919 they agreed to an 8-hour day. Thereafter, employers would not have to think about their competition and say "I would like to have an 8-hour day—also a 6-day week. But they do not do that in France, England and in Pittsburgh."

International trade questions were at the heart of the idea of an international labor organization. At the heart of it I think with this convention, once again, we return to a trade issue; we will be able to gather data and use it in our negotiations.

So, Mr. President, before I return to the specifics of the matter before us, may I first express my appreciation for the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina and for his support in this matter. I do think we are going to have a unanimous vote today.

The International Labor Organization was created by a commission which was headed by Samuel Gompers of the American Federation of Labor and it was much more a part of the campaign for the League of Nations than we remember.

Woodrow Wilson, on his great trip across the Nation campaigning for the United States to join the League, spoke continuously of the International Labor Organization. Indeed, almost the last words he spoke before his stroke, before he collapsed in Pueblo, CO, were about the ILO. Literally the last paragraphs. He told the people in Colorado about the League covenant and the ILO. But, he collapsed, and was prostrate when the international labor conference was organizing here in Washington.

His Secretary of Labor, William B. Wilson, did not know what to do. The Senate was caught up in a protracted debate about whether to have anything at all to do with the League. And a rather special event occurred. A very distinguished British civil servant, Harold Butler—later Sir Harold Butler—arrived in New York by ship and then came down here, intent on putting together the new international organization. He found the President prostrate and silent, and the Secretary of Labor unable to take any action without the President.

The first meeting of the new world organization was to be here. Well, over at the AFL, as it was then, they got a little committee together, and they got the use of the Pan American Union Building. It is still there, of course, near the White House on Constitution Avenue.

By sheer chance, he had dinner one night with the assistant Secretary of the Navy, a young, rising New York political figure, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and his wife Eleanor, and explained his difficulties. "There is nothing to worry about," said Roosevelt; "I will take care of you." Roosevelt was devoted to Wilson. He just cleaned out the offices of the Navy, the temporary buildings the Navy had built on the Mall down there—which temporary buildings lasted until the 1970's. He just threw the admirals out of their offices and opened it up to the ILO.

Harold Butler did not believe it. He said that the life of an Assistant Secretary of the Navy who threw admirals out of their offices in Whitehall would be a short and not particularly happy one.

As a matter of fact, the ILO became an issue for Franklin Roosevelt, When he was elected in 1932, one of the first things he did, thinking to move toward the League itself, was to move toward the ILO. He sent delegates to the next meeting of the International Labor Organization in the Spring as observers. The following year he proposed membership, and it went very nicely through by joint resolution and was seen by the world as a move by the United States toward the League system.

Alas, with the invasion of Abyssinia—Ethiopia, as we say—and the reoccupation of the Rhineland, no further steps were taken.

Certainly in the thinking of Roosevelt, the ILO was central to the international system. When the United Nations was put together, it was very much with the thought that the ILO would be there—the one organization of the League that survived the League. It had established through international agreements that there are certain rights that individuals have, that they are entitled to an 8-hour day, for example, and that we can agree on this across borders.

Mr. President, this may sound hyperbolic, but it is not: these were the first human rights treaties. This was the beginning of the agreements known as the Helsinki accords; the genocide convention we have talked about so much on this floor; of the whole notion, which is part of the laws of the United States, that human rights are an international obligation under the Convenant of the League of Nations, and the Charter of the United Nations, which speaks of fundamental human rights.

It should be pointed out that as we adopt this convention, we are not simply indicating the sense of the Senate, some view of things we would like to see happen and hope to see progress. We enact the laws. Treaties are the supreme law of the land.

This is a treaty. And indeed a treaty is not just any law because its enactment requires a special majority, two-thirds of the Members present and voting, not a majority. A majority will not do for a treaty. This is a solemn act we undertake.

As I said earlier, sir, it is an act which has been rare. At the advent of the administration of President Eisenhower, the United States had ratified exactly seven ILO conventions, six maritime conventions of no great consequence, and the technical convention required by the demise of the League system, and then it took some 35 years until another ILO convention came before the Senate. That was 2 years ago when the Senate voted overwhelmingly to approve two ILO conventions, in one case by a vote of 81 to 2, and in the other by a vote of 84 to 0.

At this point, knowing that he is necessarily away from the city at this moment, I wish to acknowledge the exordinary role in this turnabout, after a third of a century with no action whatever, played by the distinguished learned Senator from Utah, Senator ORRIN HATCH.

As the then-chairman, of the Committee of Labor and Human Resources—this was 4 years ago—Senator HATCH recognized that the ILO had put into place a comprehensive set of conventions which protected the human rights of workers around the world. He suspected that the failure of the United States to ratify these very same conventions, even as we advocated them, weaken our influence within the organization and limited our ability to use those treaties to protect rights in other nations.

For instance, in the 1980's the conventions that Poland had signed on freedom of association were absolutely essential to the rights Solidarity claimed before the international community. We could invoke those rights only with the partial disability of our never having ratified those conventions ourselves.

It was with this thought in mind that Senator HATCH proposed that we again begin to ratify ILO treaties. He held a hearing which he described on the floor 2 years ago. I would take the liberty of quoting him at this point. He said:

> The hearing made it quite clear that our failure to ratify a single ILO convention during the last 3 decades has undermined the effectiveness of our representatives to this important international organization. . . . Unfortunately, when we have criticized Communist violations of ILO standards, our credibility has always been somewhat suspect given our own refusal to even consider ratifying ILO conventions. To be taken seriously in this organization, Congress must break away from the policy of abstention we have practiced for the last 30 years, the policy of not ratifying a convention regardless of its content.

Mr. President, at that time—we are talking here of February 1988—Mr. HATCH's effort was strongly supported by former Secretaries of Labor William Brock and Ann McLaughlin. That is one of the nice things about the ILO. From the beginning this has been an organization in which business was represented, labor was represented, and Government had half the delegates, but only half. The chamber of commerce in the 1920's kept saying, let us get involved there. It was the trade issue. So there is nothing in the least unusual about Republican Secretaries of Labor favoring these moves. It is part of a tradition that has now entered, sir, its eighth decade.

I am happy and proud to say that a person of very special importance to this Chamber, the present Secretary of Labor, Elizabeth Dole, is strongly of the view that we should ratify this Convention. I have known Secretary Dole for a good 20 years, since we first served together in an administration here in Washington, and understand exactly how she feels about this.

At a hearing last November she told the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which the Presiding Officer is a distinguished member:

> Our ratification record is very poor indeed. Today the United States has ratified only 9 of the 169 conventions adopted by the ILO. * * * Some enshrine fundamental human rights, such as freedom of association. * * * The International Labor Organization is the United Nations most effective advocate of human rights.

May I say that again? According to the Honorable Elizabeth Dole:

> The International Labor Organization is the United Nations' most effective advocate of human rights. We are all aware, for example, of the ILO's courageous support of Solidarity during the darkest days, and the critical role it has played in Poland's historic journey to democracy. But our ratification record works against our participation in the ILO's activities precisely in this critical area. * * * It is something I feel strongly about.

I would say, Mr. President, that anything Elizabeth Dole feels strongly about, we are well advised to pay close attention to.

I will say that again: Anything Elizabeth Dole feels strongly about, we are well advised to pay close attention to.

Mr. President, that being the case, I would now like to turn to the matter of the ground rules for the ratification of the ILO conventions. They were spelled out in the declaration I have offered. They are threefold, and they should be understood by all who hear us and who will read this RECORD. They are agreed to by this extraordinary combination of government, business, and labor organizations which goes by the acronym of TAPILS, the Tripartite Advisory Panel on International Labor Standards. That is experts from the U.S. Council for International Business, which includes the National Association of Manufacturers, the AFL-CIO, and the U.S. Government.

The ground rules are as follows, sir:

First, each ILO convention shall be considered on its own merits. It must withstand scrutiny apart from any other issue involving the ILO and will not be examined on a tripartite basis: the executive branch, labor, and business should all agree. We bring these conventions to the floor with the unanimous support of the organizations that are affected. We do not say we have a two-thirds vote or a majority vote. We have consensus. It will not mean of course that everybody involved gets everything they would want. That is not the nature of consensus procedures, but the support is even so extraordinary.

The second conviction is that, if there is any difference between the convention and the Federal law and practice, these will not be changed by virtue of adopting the convention, but rather will be dealt with in the normal legislative process.

It is understood that the Federal law and practice remains in effect until changed to comply with the convention. That may have to happen in a given case because, in adopting the convention we have adopted law. We may have some intervening period, during which the Congress enacts laws to execute the convention, resolving any conflicts of law.

Finally, Mr. President, the third condition is that there is no intention to change State law and practice by ratifying a convention, and in examining each convention the parties will consider any possible conflicts with State law which might arise as a result of ratification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the Chair. My time has expired.

The distinguished ranking Member has asked me if I would allocate time in the course of the hour's debate. Seeing no Senator seeking recognition at this point, I will yield myself an additional 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

This does come out of the total hour.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the Chair.

Let me then, Mr. President, discuss for a moment the convention before us by first stating, as I said in the exchange with Senator HELMS, that the United States will not have changed its behavior one iota, one whit, to comply with this convention. The Bureau of Labor Statistics, now in its 106th year, is one of the most admirable institutions of our Government: Venerable, able.

I have the distinction to be able to say that I was in graduate school with the most able, distinguished present Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, Dr. Janet Norwood. Years ago, in the Kennedy and Johnson administrations, I was Assistant Secretary of Labor, and had very nominal oversight over the BLS. They were very generous about that, and let me think many things that were not necessarily so, but were very agreeable to hear, namely, that I helped them with their decisions which, of course, I did not.

I would like to quote Dr. Norwood, who testified about this convention at our November 1, 1989, hearing:

> It has become increasingly clear that labor market information is critically important for economic decisions by policymakers and private companies, and that comparable data across countries is important to the functioning of markets in an increasingly internationalized world.

Robert Davis, who is the Solicitor of Labor, confirmed before our committee that an exhaustive review by legal experts had established that Convention 160, the one before us today, requires no changes in U.S. law or practice. Mr. Anthony Freeman, special assistant to Secretary of State, testified in support of ratification as well.

In addition, the committee heard from such able and experienced persons in the private sector as Mr. Rudy Oswald of the AFL-CIO; Mr. Brian Glade of the U.S. Council for International Business; Edward Potter, counsel to the U.S. Council for International Business; and F.M. Lunnie, Jr., of the National Association of Manufacturers. Each of these witnesses is an expert on ILO matters and none raised the least objection. To the contrary, they put forward the strongest support for ratification.

Finally, Mr. President, I would like to note that the convention was adopted by the ILO in 1985, by a unanimous margin, 422 to zero. Also it should be noted that this is one of the last acts of President Reagan, who submitted the convention to the Senate on January 12, 1989. We are here 1 year and some weeks later and I think it could be said that we have dealt with it with some dispatch: and deliberation, but not delay.

I hope that President Reagan will take some satisfaction from the fact that he submitted to us virtually a third of the ILO treaties the United States has ratified. He submitted three conventions to us, each of which was ratified, one unanimously, one as near as makes no matter, and, I hope, we will have a unanimously vote again today.

Mr. President, before I yield the floor, there is a final matter that should be touched upon briefly. My colleagues will remember that in 1977 the United States withdrew from the ILO. This was a bipartisan decision. As Ambassador at the United Nations under a Republican administration in 1975 it fell to me to draft the letter stating that the United States would withdraw at the close of the mandatory 2-year notice period. When that moment came, in 1977, I stood on this floor as a Democratic Senator and moved that the United States do just that. It was the policy of both President Ford and President Carter. Our complaints with the ILO were several, but chiefly, that it had come to apply a double standard to the conduct of nations in the West and in the totalitarian block and that it was being abused as a forum to carryout political agendas unrelated to its legitimate purposes.

The bitter medicine of U.S. withdrawal had its effect. In 1980 the United States rejoined. Questioned on this matter at the committee hearing, Mr. Freeman of the State Department replied:

[W]e think that the ILO has been doing a good job * * * particularly since our return to the ILO." He cited, as did Secretary Dole, an ILO report which was "highly critical of Polish efforts to crush the Solidarity trade union." He cited ILO criticisms of Romania, Czechoslovakia, and the Soviet Union, including specific ILO attacks on Article Six of the Soviet Constitution which the Soviets are now discarding. Secretary Dole concluded that "we can be fairly certain that the United States will be measured by the same yardstick as other ILO members. * * *

Mr. President, today we will vote on the third ILO convention we have considered in 2 years. Others are being examined by TAPILS—the tripartite body of legal experts—and may very soon be forwarded to the Senate for consideration. Among these are important, substantive treaties, including a convention on the prevention of forced labor. So we will be hearing much more about the work of the ILO in the days to come.

Mr. President, I would like to congratulate the Washington branch office of the ILO for their excellent work in assisting the committee in this matter. In particular, Steve Schlossberg continues his absolutely outstanding service in the cause of labor rights. I also wish to acknowledge the great assistance of Mr. Schlossberg's colleague, Don Smythe.

I thank the Presiding Officer so very much for his thoughtful cooperation.

My time having expired, I yield the floor and will not resume the floor unless the occasion seems to require it later on.

Mr. President, as no Senator appears to be seeking recognition at this point, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERREY). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask that a statement by Senator HATCH be printed in the RECORD. That statement expresses Senator HATCH's strong support for this ILO Convention. Senator HATCH is representing the Senate at the United Nations General Assembly Special Session on Drug Control, which is also taking place today.

The statement follows:

INTERNATIONAL LABOR ORGANIZATION CONVENTION NO. 160

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, it is with great pleasure that I rise today in support of ratification of International Labor Organization Convention No. 160, which concerns labor statistics. It marks the third such convention we will have had the opportunity to ratify within the last 3 years. The United States is already in full compliance with this technical convention due to the existing work of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

My distinguished colleague from New York, Senator MOYNIHAN, is an internationally renowned scholar on the International Labor Organization, and I want to thank him again for his dedication, interest, and support for the need to ratify these conventions. He understands the important role this international body plays in other countries and the way it can help improve the working conditions of people around the world. He also appreciates, I believe, the quiet but positive impact our participation in the organization has had on our Nation's foreign policy and credibility.

There was an unfortunate 35 year hiatus in the willingness of the United States to even consider ratification of an ILO convention. In September 1985, I held a hearing on the ratification process in the hope that by focusing attention on this area, we might regenerate some activity. Secretary Brock took the challenge and revitalized the necessary tripartite review procedures among representatives from business, labor, and the Federal Government. He reconvened the President's Committee on the ILO and the Tripartite Advisory Panel on International Labor Standards, and their collective efforts ultimately led to the ratification of two conventions in 1988 and submission of Convention No. 160.

The review procedure was rejuvenated after an agreement was reached on three ground rules and the creation of a two-track system. The ground rules were first that each ILO convention would be examined on its own merits on a tripartite basis; second, that if there are differences between the convention and existing Federal law or practice, these differences would be addressed in the normal legislative process; and third, that there was no intention to change State law or practice through the ratification process.

It was also agreed that there would be two separate tracks for reviewing ILO conventions. The first track would consider the numerous technical conventions, such as Convention No. 160, which can be ratified rather easily. The second track addresses the more fundamental ILO human rights treaties, which go to the heart of labor and employment law in the United States. Care must always be made that in ratifying these conventions, our constitutionally required, Federal bicameral legislative process is not usurped.

I was pleased to learn, Mr. President, that the Tripartite Advisory Panel has been working on other conventions. In September 1989, they concluded that ILO Convention No. 105 concerning forced labor could be ratified without amending our domestic labor laws, subject to two understandings to clarify how the convention could be implemented in the United States. It is my understanding that a decision on whether to recommend this convention for ratification will be made by the executive branch next month. If ratified, it would be the first ILO human rights treaty adopted by the United States.

Moreover, I understand that the Tripartite Advisory Panel is currently reviewing for ratification Convention No. 138 on child labor, Convention No. 150 on labor administration, Convention No. 111 on equal treatment, and Convention No. 87 on freedom of association.

Mr. President, as we witness daily the euphoric quest for freedom in Eastern Europe and other countries throughout the world, it should be noted that in several, such as Poland, a vigorous free trade movement has been a catalyst for freedom. While we as a body search for ways to support these changes, we may never find one as effective as the International Labor Organization. By continuing to work within the organization, reviewing and where possible ratifying its conventions, we can help to foster throughout the world a true atmosphere of democratic freedom.

I hope my colleagues will join in support of this important convention.●

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, in the remaining moments before we vote in the ILO Convention before us, I would take the opportunity to recall the role of the International Labor Organization in the survival of the Solidarity trade union movement.

First, Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the convention at the appointed time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, it is simply a fact that, throughout the 1980's, as the struggle went back and forth between the Polish Communist Party and the Solidarity labor movement, Poland's having ratified the landmark conventions relating to freedom of association was vital. First, there was Convention No. 87, freedom of association and protection of the right to organize, and then Convention No. 98, the right to organize and bargain collectively. Ratification of these conventions was a fact which the Government of Poland could not deny. In 1978, the International Federation for Free Trade Unions charged Poland with violating Convention No. 87. The ILO agreed.

Mr. President, the point here is that as we grow familiar with our post-Leninist world, we see that there can be more than one trade union in a Communist country. But that was not so in Poland in the 1970's. The Communist Party had the same leading role that it has had in Moscow, and no competing organizations had the right to exist, but under the ILO conventions, they did.

In 1980, Poland's Minister of Labor wrote to the ILO Director General stating that Poland officially recognized Solidarity, the first independent trade union to gain national recognition in a Communist country—the first ever. And the 1980's began with that fact. Lech Walesa went to the 1981 International Labor Conference as Poland's labor delegate. Then in 1981, the Government tried to withdraw recognition, and it went back and forth and back and forth. But the basic fact is that Poland was obliged by treaty to recognize Solidarity, and domestic law, even martial law, could not undo those treaty obligations.

We owe a very great deal to the organization which Franklin D. Roosevelt helped in September 1919, the name of which formed almost the last words on the lips of Woodrow Wilson before he collapsed. The ILO was founded under a charter drafted by a commission headed by Samuel Gompers. It was one part of the league system that we joined when Franklin Roosevelt returned to Washington as President. It is still there today and more relevant than ever.

I close these remarks by stating that the first human rights treaties ever adopted in history were adopted at the Pan American Union in November 1919 at the first meeting of the International Labor Organization; it occurred in the United States and it is something the United States can be proud of today as we adopt our 10th International Labor Convention. It is the third in 2 years. This is a moment which I think we can also take pride in, and we certainly want to express our gratitude to the labor and business organizations that have cooperated in bringing this convention to the floor.

I again thank the Secretary of Labor for her diligence in advocating the matter. I, for my part, would like to thank Mr. Nirenberg and the ranking Republican member for his courtesy and support throughout.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having expired, the question is on agreeing to the declaration to the resolution of ratification offered by the Senator from New York.

The declaration was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of ratification with the declaration. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, may I note, sir, that this is the second occasion in 2 years that the U.S. Senate has unanimously agreed to the ratification of an International Labor Organization convention, a fact which I know the world will take note of, and which we can be proud of.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order the Senate will return to legislative session.

EXTENSION OF AUTHORIZATION OF CERTAIN SCHOOL DROPOUT DEMONSTRATION PROGRAMS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order the Senate will proceed to the consideration of Calendar Order No. 124, H.R. 2281, on which there will be 1 hour of debate, to be equally divided and controlled by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PELL] and the Senator from Kansas [Mrs. KASSEBAUM] or their designees.

The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 2281) to amend the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 to extend the authorization for certain school dropout demonstration programs.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. PELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am extremely pleased that we are considering H.R. 2281, which would provide a 2-year extension of the School Dropout Demonstration Assistance Act. This act is the result of legislation I originally introduced in 1985. Since its enactment in 1988, this important program has provided over $45 million in grants to school districts to address the very severe problem of students who drop out of high school without getting their diploma.

The Senate has already passed two other pieces of legislation to extend the School Dropout Act. Most recently, for example, we included continuation of this important program in the President's Educational Excellence Act. Last year, its continuation was made of part of the Taft Institute reauthorization, which was approved by the Senate in November.

Unfortunately, reauthorization of the Dropout Program has been jeopardized by the long delay that ensued after the President's education package was reported to the Senate floor. As my colleagues know, I was opposed to that delay and very much regret that it occurred. It has seriously damaged prospects for continued funding of the program during the current fiscal year. We are eager, therefore, to reauthorize the dropout program as a separate measure so that we can insure that it will not come to an end.

Today, the need for the School Dropout Assistance Act remains just as critical as it was when it became law 2 years ago. The annual dropout rate in this nation averages 25 percent. That figure can reach an alarming 50 percent, or even higher, in many urban areas. And for specific at-risk populations, the percentage of students leaving school before graduation can be an overwhelming 80 percent.

The economic waste that results from this situation is terrible. School dropouts swell our unemployment and welfare rolls. And, if dropouts do find jobs, those jobs all too frequently require only minimal skills and involve only minimal wages.

A major study conducted by UCLA also shows that school dropouts represent a significant loss in potential revenue and productivity. This loss adds up to $200 million per year for each graduating class, and over their lifetime can balloon upwards to $200 billion. It is this figure which I find most troublesome. For while dropping out of school holds severe repercussions for the individual student, and while it means an immediate cost to us in welfare and other social costs, it is the loss in productivity and output which poses the greatest danger.

We simply cannot afford to lose even one student. The decade of the nineties will place us squarely in the center of an economic battle for international markets that, by comparison with the past, will look relatively tame. The transition to a European Community in 1992 poses a particularly significant challenge for our Nation's industries, which will have to compete with the newly formed European Common Market. To fend off this threat we must have a vigorous work force—one that is highly skilled and inventive.

We have already seen considerable evidence of our weakening position in the world economy. But it is not too late to turn that situation around. America today is still a vitally functioning economic power. Our industries continue to hold the attention of the world. And it is America's citizens who can still claim that they invent the majority of new markets, materials and products.

Our Nation also has tremendous resources, the greatest of which is our people. But these resources requires a significant investment in education and training to keep them within the mainstream of international competition. Maintaining our cutting edge in the new global economy will require nothing less than the full contribution of the talents of each of our citizens.

Figures from the Department of Labor indicate that of the 20 fastest growing occupations, at least 18 will require 2 years or more of higher education preparation. And it is projected that up to 9 percent of these jobs could go unfilled because of insufficiently skilled workers. We must, therefore, make every effort to keep our students in the educational pipeline, so that once part of the work force, they are able to meet the constantly changing demands of the workplace. It is both wrong and unwise to let our Nation lose ground in the international market because high-skilled jobs go unfilled while unskilled workers remain unemployed.

That is why the measure before us this afternooon is so critical. For, in reauthorizing the School Dropout Demonstration Assistance Act, we set our sights on the future, a future that is one of economic strength and expansion for our country and for our citizens.

Projects funded under this act in the last 2 years have shown great promise in keeping students in schools and in ensuring that their time spent in school is meaningful and productive.

One of the most outstanding projects is the Providence Dropout Prevention Collaborative in my home State of Rhode Island. This project has brought together a broad crosssection of the Providence community to reduce their dropout rate. This program began under the initiative of Dr. Marcia Feld, Dan Challener and Peg Dyer of the Urban Field Center at the University of Rhode Island. They combined their talents and efforts with the superintendent, Dr. Joseph Almagno, the assistant superintendent, Neil Corkery, and Mary O'Brien of the Providence School Department, as well as Marcia Reback, president of the Providence Teachers Union. Henry Woodbridge, executive director of Workforce 2000, and other representatives of business and industry are also part of the collaborative. And many other members of the Providence community have given freely of their time for this critical endeavor.

The Federal program has also provided grants to 87 other projects in 31 other States, including Iowa, Oregon, Tennessee, and Pennsylvania.

We have only just begun to tackle this serious problem, and we simply cannot afford to have the program end at this critical juncture. In cities—like Providence—where work has begun, it must be continued. In areas where work has not begun, it must be encouraged and initiated.

This year the President has submitted a budget request of $45 million for the school dropout program, which is more than double the current appropriation. I am greatly heartened by the support that the executive branch has demonstrated for this program. The President's voice is a welcome addition to what we have been saying for many years. It is an indication that the White House has come to recognize the stake that we have in insuring that these at-risk students are educated to the full limits of their potential.

No greater investment can be made than in the training and education of our young. The student we keep in school may well blossom into the person who one day may find the cure for cancer, solve the problem of cleaning up our environment, or bring to fruition our goal of providing a lasting peace on this planet. No one could ask for a greater yield on an investment than that.

Mr. President, within the hour it is my hope that we will approve this legislation, and send it to the President so that it might quickly be signed into law. Then we can continue the work begun in 1988 and move headlong to an even stronger future.

I yield the floor.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I am pleased that the Senate is considering H.R. 2281, legislation to extend the authorization of the School Dropout Demonstration Assistance Act through fiscal year 1991. This measure was approved by the House of Representatives last June.

The School Dropout Demonstration Assistance Act was established in 1988 as part of the Hawkins-Stafford school improvement amendments (Public Law 100-297). The purpose of the program is to support the establishment or expansion of model programs to reduce the number of school dropouts. These model programs can provide needed information about effective means for identifying and supporting students at risk of dropping out and for encouraging students who have already dropped out to reenter school.

There is a pressing need to find effective ways to stem the flow of students dropping out of our schools. Each year, we lose 650,000 to 700,000 students who leave school without graduating. Overall, our national high school completion rate is just over 71 percent.

In his recent State of the Union Address, President Bush put forth a series of national educational goals—among them one that the United States increase the high school graduation rate to 90 percent.

The need to keep young people in school cannot be emphasized too strongly. Failure to receive a high school diploma spells tragedy for the individual dropout, who operates at a permanent disadvantage in job prospects and lifetime earnings. It is a tragedy as well for our Nation, which loses the productive capacity we so badly need from all of our workers.

As dropout figures attest, we are doing a disappointing job in emphasizing the importance of education. Far too many young people fail to recognize the need to make this investment in their futures. The School Dropout Demonstration Assistance Act attempts to assure that our efforts to turn this situation around will be based on strategies that work.

The fiscal year 1989 funding level for this program was $21.7 million, and the Department of Education awarded 89 demonstration grants during the 1988-89 school year.

These grants have made possible a wide variety of demonstration programs. Grant size ranged from just $23,000 to nearly $500,000. The vast majority of grants were awarded in urban areas, but rural projects comprised nearly 25 percent of the total.

The majority of the programs are either comprehensive K-12 or middle school/high school projects. Seventy percent of these programs were not in operation prior to the receipt of a grant award, and most of these new programs were modeled on successful efforts in other school districts. Nearly all the programs received at least half of their support from the Federal grant, and 80 percent received supplemental funding from their local school budget.

The number of students served ranged from a low of 30 to a high of 11,500. Nearly all programs targeted educationally or economically disadvantaged students. Approximately one-third of the programs included pregnant teenagers as a target population. Poor attendance and/or truancy records were most frequently used in identifying program participants, although many of the programs also relied upon test scores, teacher recommendations, grade-level performance, and discipline problems.

Social and personal services, including individual counseling and parental involvement, were offered in well over 90 percent of the programs. Academic services were also routinely offered, and approximately three-fourths of the programs offered vocational services as well. A substantial number of programs provided services such as transportation and/or coordination with social services programs. In general, these programs operated at regular school sites during the school year. Most had a small number of full- or part-time staff.

Authorization for the program expired in fiscal year 1989. Consequently, no funding is currently available for the program. Enactment of H.R. 2281 would permit funding to resume in fiscal years 1990 and 1991 at an authorization level of $50 million in each of those years.

In addition, this legislation makes three modifications in the original program:

First, it expands the number of grants available to partnerships with local educational agencies. Currently, 25 percent of the grants are made available to partnerships. Under this legislation, grants to partnerships could fall in a range of 25 to 50 percent of the funding available for the program.

Second, it authorizes the Secretary of Education to use up to $1.5 million for program evaluation expenses.

Finally, it provides that evaluation reports will be submitted within 6 months after the end of the grant period.

It is important that we build upon the work which has already begun in this area. The potential demonstrated by these initial grant awards has been recognized by the administration. The President's budget proposal recommends a fiscal year 1991 funding level of $45 million for dropout demonstration programs. I urge all of my colleagues to join in support of continuing this important effort.

I yield the floor.

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I want to express my support for this bill. Passage of this legislation will enable the Department of Education to continue the school dropout programs currently authorized in law.

Before the recess, this body passed the National Literacy Act of 1989. That legislation is aimed at solving the problems which happen after students leave school. The legislation we are addressing today will help to ensure that all of the citizens of this country are literate, by preventing them from dropping out of school in the first place. This legislation is actually a prevention program for illiteracy.

The workplace continues to require more education for workers. Ninety percent of the workers of the future will need at least 2 years of education beyond high school according to projections by the Department of Labor. This means that our society cannot afford to have students leaving high school if we are to have the work force we need for the 21st century.

We also need to reduce the dropout rate for the individual growth and progression of the citizens. Any person who leaves high school without graduating limits the job options and career opportunities which are open to him or her. Studies have shown that the average earnings of a high school graduate are 20 percent higher than those of someone who has not completed high school. People with lower wages have a lower standard of living during their working lives and at retirement. Consequently, the decision a student makes at 16 to leave school will affect that student for his or her entire life and will also have negative consequences for any children he or she may have. It is imperative that these students be guided at an early age so that they will not make the wrong choice.

My home State of Utah is running some demonstration programs for dropouts. One of the programs is centered in the San Juan School District wherein approximately 50 percent of the students are native Americans. The district currently has two demonstration programs with funds from the Federal Government. One involves just the San Juan School Distict and the other is a joint program with the College of Eastern Utah. One program works with children and parents in elementary school to increase communication between the school and parents through more counseling. In the 2 years since the program has been operating, the attendance rate has increased by 5 percent.

In a program at the high school level, 125 students were identified who were at least 2 years below grade level. In a 2-year period of time, 50 percent of these students were back at grade level. Another program is aimed at encouraging students who left school to return for some form of additional training, either through Job Corps, adult education programs, alternative high school, or the traditional program. Of the 100 students who were targeted for this program 2 years ago, 82 have returned, although not all 82 have yet completed their training.

I think you can see how successful these demonstrations can be. Programs such as those currently underway will serve to help those students at risk of leaving school. I urge my colleagues' support of the extension of the authorization of this legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I yield such time as the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts desires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, over 750,000 American students will drop out of school this year. They will have many reasons for doing so, including poor teachers, broken homes, devastated communities, poverty, drug use, and the need to go to work. Whatever the cause, their decision is a tragedy for them and for the Nation.

These dropouts—along with the other 4.2 million young adults who have no high school diplomas—will have a higher rate of unemployment, greater dependency on social welfare programs, and lower income—22 percent lower than that of the average high school graduate. They represent a significant loss for the Nation in terms of the contribution to our national well-being that they will be unable to make.

A report recently issued by the Department of Education shows that 28 percent of our Nation's 18- and 19-year-olds have not graduated from high school. The figures are even higher for minorities: 42 percent of black and 52 percent of Hispanic 18- and 19-year-olds failed to graduate. If we consider 20- and 21-year-olds, the figures look slightly better, but are still too high: 15 percent of whites and 18 percent of black 20- and 21-year-olds have not graduated. The number for Hispanics remains intolerable: 45 percent have not graduated.

The report is encouraging in that it shows the gap between black and white dropout rates has narrowed significantly in the last decade. This improvement points to the effectiveness of Federal and local education programs targeted at this population.

Nonetheless, dropout rates—especially the high levels for Hispanics and even higher levels for native Americans—continue to be grossly unacceptable. In my own State of Massachusetts, black students continue to drop out at twice the rates of whites, while Hispanic students drop out at three times the rate of whites.

Today, the Senate is considering the extension of the only Federal program specifically designed to stem the tide of school dropouts. This legislation, H.R. 2281, is vitally important. We need to ensure that it is promptly approved and that the necessary funds are provided.

In 1987, Congress passed the School Dropout Prevention Demonstration Act, resulting in $45.6 million over 2 years in grants to local educational agencies, community-based organizations, and private/public partnerships for the development of innovative ways to keep students in school. These methods range from early intervention services for first and second graders to transition programs that help dropouts return to school.

Many of these programs have had notable success. In rural Illinois, Operation Rebound provides transportation, private tutors, and counseling for at-risk students and one-time dropouts who might not otherwise graduate or make the transition back to school. Half of the 300 students served each year go on to higher education.

In Massachusetts, the Cambridge public schools have used their grant to bring social workers and psychologists into 10 schools to work with at-risk students, their families, teachers, and school administrators. Federal funds have also allowed them to hire translators so that teachers can work more closely with parents of Hispanics, Portuguese, and Haitian students.

In Portland, OR, school district No. 1 helps at-risk students through a combination of six programs—drug and alcohol counseling, parent outreach, peer counseling, attendance monitoring, transition services for return students, and a student service center. After only 2 years, the freshman dropout rate has fallen 10 percent.

While these efforts are laudable, they are far from adequate. The Education Department received over 800 proposals for funding under the Dropout Prevention Act, and has been able to make only 89 awards serving 50,000 students. We need to do more. An article in this weekend's New York Times reported that Philadelphia is able to reach only 1,750 of the city's 101,000 high school students, Chicago serves less than half of its 200,000 students at risk of dropping out, and Los Angeles has programs for only 144 of its 600 schools.

Through these dropout programs, we can help our students and our Nation. At the same time we can acquire better information on how to prevent dropouts. With the data and information generated from this program, we will make major strides in understanding the problems that lead students to drop out and identifying concrete steps to address this crisis.

The action we are taking today would extend the current 2-year grant program for an additional 2 years. It would authorize $50 million each year to expand existing programs and establish new, innovative projects.

I was gratified to see that last week Secretary Cavazos named the Nation's first special advisor on dropout prevention and at-risk youth. In addition, the President's 1991 budget includes a request of $45 million for the program we are extending today. This modest investment will yield high returns: The Chicago public schools estimate that for each dollar we invest in dropout prevention, we will receive $12 in increased tax revenues and lowered social welfare costs and crime. This kind of investment speaks for itself.

I urge my colleagues to approve the extension of this important program.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the New York Times article on dropout prevention programs be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 17, 1990]

CUTTING THE DROPOUT RATE: HIGH GOAL BUT LOW HOPES

(By Michael deCourcy Hinds)

American educators are trying almost anything to keep children in school. They give pizza parties in Chicago, promise after-school and summer jobs in Philadelphia, hold drawings for used cars in Milwaukee and enroll American Indian youths in private schools in Minnesota, at state expense.

The challenge of reducing the dropout rate is something educators around the country have been struggling with for many years, with programs that are often experimental and, in any case, reach few of those at risk for leaving school. In his State of the Union speech, President Bush set a goal of graduating 90 percent of high school students by the year 2000.

Over and over, school officials say they do not have the money to spend on much more than the basics, and certainly not enough to solve the larger problems of society like poor housing and drug abuse that contribute to the dropout rate. The nation's high schools now graduate about 71 percent of students who enter as freshmen, a figure that has remained about the same for two decades.

INSPIRATION STRESSED

"Is it realistic to build a school system that graduates 90 percent of its students?" said Dr. Ernest L. Boyer, president of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching. "Yes, if we really mean it. Yes, if we're willing to put resources into it. Simply declaring it as a vision and not defining a program will leave us in 10 years about where we are now."

But the Bush Administration says more inspiration than money is needed at this point.

"Per-pupil expenditures increased dramatically, by 29 percent over inflation, during the last decade, but reading scores and other results were essentially flat over that period," said Christopher T. Cross, the Assistant Secretary of Education for educational research and improvement. "What the critics are missing is that we have to have commitment to change values, to motivate students. Until we get that, throwing more money at the problem won't change it."

PHILADELPHIA SUCCESS STORY

Education experts could come up with no example of a school or school district that has succeeded in making what Dr. Boyer called "that great leap," raising its graduation rate nearly 20 percentage points, as Mr. Bush wants for the whole nation. More commonly, a school with a low dropout rate never had a major problem retaining students in the first place.

Schools are increasingly encouraging teamwork with local businesses, which do have money to devote to dropout prevention programs, as an investment in a more qualified work force.

One of the oldest and most successful pairings of business and education is in Philadelphia. A 20-year-old program, offered at 14 of the city's 21 high schools, integrates academic courses with vocational training in auto mechanics, business and other careers.

The program, Philadelphia High School Academies, recruits eighth graders considered likely to drop out with guarantees of after-school and summer jobs, at $5.75 an hour. More than 93 percent of the students who enter the program graduate, as against 70 percent for the school district over all.

But the program now reaches only 1,750 of the city's 101,000 high school students, said Natalie S. Allen, president of the program. "We hope to be able to serve 5,000 kids by 1995," she said, adding that a program that large would cost about $1.2 million a year.

Mrs. Allen said the money would have to come from businesses and foundations rather than the school district, which faces a $60 million deficit next year in its $1 billion budget. In the 1987-1988 school year local businesses contributed $400,000 to the program; last year they gave $830,000.

PIZZA AND USED CARS

In Milwaukee, where only 60 percent of the students graduate from high school, principals are enlisting local businesses to provide incentives for children who improve their attendance, grades and behavior, said David C. Begel, a spokesman for the district, which has 98,000 students.

Most companies give away small things like certificates for pizza, but two car dealerships give away used cars. Two schools let their most-improved students participate in a drawing for a car each year.

"Clearly, it's an incentive for some kids, but I don't know how you would quantify the impact," Mr. Begel said. The programs have been in effect for three years at one school and one year at another.

Chicago spends $3.8 billion a year on its public schools, including $1 million on programs to prevent pregnancy, a key reason for dropping out. Much of the money in that program is spent on pizza parties and party gifts to draw students to seminars.

"Counselors try to build their self-esteem and teach them about their bodies," said Dr. Grace G. Dawson, director of the district's Division of Dropout Prevention. "We think we're reducing the pregnancy rate by as much as 50 percent."

PROGRAMS SEEN AS LIMITED

But she said this program and several other dropout prevention programs reach fewer than half the 200,000 students considered at risk of dropping out. There are 410,000 students in the city's school system, Dr. Dawson said the dropout rate ranged from 20 percent in some schools to 70 percent in others.

In Los Angeles, a three-year effort to curb a 39 percent dropout rate has the money to serve only 144 of the district's 600 schools, said Peter Martinez, coordinator of the district's Dropout Prevention Office. The budget for his program is $5.6 million this year, out of a district budget of $3.2 billion.

One of the more novel ideas, which started in West Virginia two years ago and has already spread to Texas, Florida, Louisiana, Wisconsin and Ohio, is to revoke the driver's license of dropouts and truants.

"We're very pleased with the law," said Therese M. Wilson, acting director of the Office of Education Support Services in West Virginia's Department of Education. So far, the state has revoked the licenses of 1,003 teenagers, she said. As a result, 170 teenagers have returned to school and 163 others have enrolled in high school equivalency programs.

"West Virginia is pretty rural, so if you don't have a license you really can't get around," she said.

Minnesota is the only state that graduates more than 90 percent of its high school students. Six other states graduate slightly more than 85 percent of their students, according to a study of the high school class of 1987 conducted by the United States Department of Education. The states are Iowa, Montana, Nebraska, North Dakota, Wisconsin and Wyoming.

Florida ranked last, the department said, with 58 percent graduating, while Georgia, Louisiana, Michigan and New York had only slightly better rates. In the District of Columbia, the graduation rate is only 55.5 percent.

Schools in Minnesota have graduated 89 to 91 percent of their students since 1981, when data were first collected, said Robert J. Wedl, the state's Deputy Commissioner of Education. He conceded that the state had few minority students and less poverty than the national average, around the country, minority members and the poor are more likely to drop out. But he said it also helped that the state had long given education to top priority.

"We're graduating 91 percent of our kids, but that's not nearly enough," Mr. Wedl said. "It's not O.K. to throw away 10 percent of our kids."

A FLEXIBLE SCHOOL SYSTEM

With 720,000 students and a $3.8 billion budget, Minnesota ranks 17th in per-pubil spending. The state has developed a flexible school system, with a wide variety of specialty and year-round schools, and students can attend any school within commuting distance.

In 1988, when Minnesota could not keep one-third of its American Indian students from dropping out of high school, the Legislature passed a law permitting the State Department of Education to pay for private school for Indian children at risk of dropping out.

"You have the change the school to suit the child, rather than trying to change the child to suit the school," said Dr. David Beaulieu, the state director of Indian education.

He said school districts contracted with seven private schools, including three runs by tribal governments, that graduate 90 percent of their students. The schools provide students with a great deal of individual instruction in an amblence and cirriculum that reflect Indian society and culture, he said.

The Annual Dropout Rate is the percentage of students who dropped out between July 1, 1986 and June 30, 1987. The Projected Four-Year Rate is an estimate of the proportion of students who entered grade nine in 1986 who may not graduate.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I commend the chairman of the Education Subcommittee, Senator PELL, for his constancy in developing this legislation, and for bringing the legislation into the consolidated form that it is in today. It is stronger legislation than the ways in which we have approached it in the past.

I commend Senator KASSEBAUM for her work in this area. She has made the needs of education a top priority of hers and has had a very positive and impressive impact both in this legislation and the other education programs which have come out of our committee.

I also commend and congratulate the Senator from Illinois, PAUL SIMON, who worked tirelessly on the legislation. I hope it will be passed by overwhelming majority.

Mr. President, I yield back my time.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of our full committee, without whose help and support none of our education bills will get through. I appreciate his kind words.

BASIC SKILLS FUNDING

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, section 1 of H.R. 2281 adds a restriction to the authorization for the School Dropout Demonstration Assistance Act so that funds are not available in any year in which funds are appropriated for part C of chapter 1 of title I. Part C is the Secondary School Programs for Basic Skills Improvement and Dropout Prevention and Reentry which was created as part of Public Law 100-297, the 1988 omnibus reauthorization of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. Could my colleague from Rhode Island provide a little legislative history as to why this particular provision is part of H.R. 2281?

Mr. PELL. Certainly, I would be glad to answer the question of the senior Senator of Massachusetts. When we reauthorized the Elementary and Secondary Education Act in 1988, we in effect created three programs: First, the School Dropout Demonstration Assistance Act; second, the Secondary Schools Basic Skills Demonstration Assistance Act; and third, the Secondary School Programs for Basic Skills Improvement and Dropout Prevention and Reentry. The first two demonstration grant programs are authorized through 1989. In fiscal year 1990, the authorization for the third program was to become effective. The third program is basically a combination of both demonstration programs, providing assistance to address both the school dropout problem and the need to expand basic skills instruction in secondary schools. This third program is different from the first two, however, in that it distributes money to the States on the basis of the chapter 1 formula rather than on the basis of discretionary grants awarded by the Secretary of Education.

It was our intent when we created the first two programs to authorize these programs as demonstration programs through fiscal year 1989, and then to roll them into one formula-driven program beginning in fiscal year 1990. The dropout demonstration program was authorized through fiscal year 1989 at a level of $50 million, and the secondary schools basic skills demonstration program was authorized through fiscal year 1989 at a level of $200 million. Beginning in fiscal year 1990, these programs were to be combined into one program at an authorization level of $400 million to provide money to each State on the basis of the chapter 1 formula for these two activities. The formula program, contained in pact C of chapter 1 of title I, directs the State to spend one-half on basic skills for secondary school students, and up to one-half on preventing students from dropping out of schoool.

We established this structure so that we could first fund demonstration projects to develop the most effective methods for addressing these needs. The information gained from the operation of these programs—especially that of identifying what works—would then enable us to provide much more comprehensive assistance, with the assurance that we had proven successful programs as models.

At the time, we had envisioned that by fiscal year 1990 sufficient appropriations would be available to distribute money to the States on basis of the chapter 1 formula, as is provided under part C of chapter 1 of title I. To date, however, appropriations for the part C program have not been forthcoming. We therefore have extended the authorization of the demonstration program to continue the progress already underway and to begin new projects in other school districts. Once sufficient funds are available to provide this kind of assistance in every State, we could then switch to a formula-driven program. In our view, distribution by formula would require an appropriation level which is close to $100 million. This level would insure that when the allocation is distributed to the States, each State has sufficient funds to operate at least one successful program.

The language referencing the part C program is designed to ease the transition from a demonstration grant program to a formula-driven program in the event that sufficient funds for the part C program were made available.

Mr. KENNEDY. As you know, $5 million in appropriations has been provided for the basic skills for secondary school students in the fiscal year 1990 appropriations. This money has been provided for the basis skills demonstration grant program authorized under section 6103—in part B of title VI—of Public Law 100-297. It was not appropriated for the basic skills/dropout prevention formula-driven program which is authorized under section 1108—in part C of chapter I of title I—of that same law. The language in H.R. 2281 refers only to the title I part C formula-driven program, and does not apply to the title VI part B demonstration grant program. Am I therefore correction in understanding that the $5 million fiscal year 1990 appropriation for the basic skills demonstration program would not affect the authorization for the School Dropout Demonstration Assistance Act under the language in H.R. 2281?

Mr. PELL. Yes, that is entirely correct. The fiscal year 1990 appropriation for the basic skills program will be distributed in the form of discretionary grants from the Secretary of Education, and not by formula as contained in part C of title I of ESEA. Thus, under the language in H.R. 2281, the school dropout demonstration program authorization would not be affected by the fiscal year 1990 appropriations.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank my colleague for clarifying the fact that the language in H.R. 2281 does not apply to the $5 million appropriations for basic skills provided under fiscal year 1990 appropriations.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, what is the time situation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island has 17 minutes and 38 seconds remaining and the Senator from Kansas has 27 minutes and 30 seconds remaining.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I am pleased to support passage of H.R. 2281, the National School Dropout Demonstration Assistance Act. This bill will reauthorize a highly-important program that, currently, is the Federal Government's only active program aimed at preventing high school-aged students from dropping out of school.

In the 1988 School Improvement Act this program was given a 2-year authorization that must be renewed this year for it to continue. Also included in the 1988 act was a larger, more-comprehensive, State-administered anti-dropout program entitled the Secondary School Program for Basic Skills Improvement and Dropout Prevention. The money simply has not been there to begin funding this second program, so it is imperative that we keep the dropout demonstration program alive.

Recently, Congress has been paying great attention to the critical educational needs of this country. Within the past few weeks the Senate passed a large legislative package designed to engender reform and generate excellence in American education. We also passed an important measure to coordinate and enhance national literacy improvement efforts.

America's disturbingly high dropout rate is perhaps the most significant condition we face urging us to reform and improve our educational system. Students who drop out have given up on education—a decision that will often harm them well into the future, as their disinterest for learning continues throughout their lives.

With some 600,000 to 700,000 American students dropping out of school every year we are putting far too many at risk of failing throughout their lives. In my State of New Mexico it has been estimated that nearly 28 percent of our students will dropout of high school—giving us the 12th highest dropout rate in the country. This high rate is driven by frighteningly higher dropout rates among our Hispanic and native American students.

Where does this lead? It has been estimated that fewer than 40 percent of New Mexico's poor high school dropouts, aged 15-21, were employed in 1985. Only 20 percent of these managed to find full-time work.

It is important to find ways to help these children before they drop out. In 1988, when work on the larger dropout prevention legislation was being done, I introduced a bill entitled the Educational Block Grant for Children at Risk Act. The goal of that legislation was to enable local communities to pool the various resources and services they have available so as to meet the complex educational and social needs of children who are at risk of failing in education.

Mr. President, education is a difficult enterprise, requiring tremendous effort on behalf of both teacher and student. While often it seems we encounter students who seem unreachable, we still must find a way to reach them. Sometimes this can be accomplished with some creativity—using new or different educational techniques that meet the diverse needs of different students. Often, this may also require educators to collaborate with others in the community who can help meet some of the complex needs youngsters have—people who can also help reach our students.

Surely our efforts to engender educational reform and promote excellence should be our central path to improving the education available to students. But programs such as the one we are reauthorizing today are highly important as well. Through this program we can help facilitate some of the creativity and collaboration necessary to reach kids who are at risk of failing in our educational system.

I am pleased the Senate is moving to reauthorize this important program and I urge my colleagues to support it as well.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I yield such time as he may desire to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. KOHL].

Mr. KOHL. Mr. President, I rise today to extend my support for the reauthorization of the National School Dropout Demonstration Assistance Act, and to thank my distinguished colleague from Rhode Island [Mr. PELL] for bringing this bill before the Senate for consideration.

Many are focusing on our need for new programs and new funds to meet the education goals set by the President and the Governors. I agree that we have to explore new approaches, but that does not mean we have to ignore the programs we already have in place. The National School Dropout Demonstration Assistance Act is an existing program which is dealing with some of the most difficult and hard to solve problems facing our educational system. It deserves our continued support.

Today, I would like to share with you the success of one dropout prevention program in Wisconsin. That program is called Project Hold.

Project Hold is a program which has been funded since August 1988 under the Dropout Demonstration Assistance Program.

Project Hold is a nationally acclaimed program at the Milwaukee Area Technical College [MATC], working with young people, to help reduce the dropout rate in the Milwaukee area. Participants range in age from middle school students through young adults in their early twenties.

Over 1,500 students have been identified and contacted through Project Hold; 406 students have reenrolled in MATC/Community based organization programs; 172 students have reenrolled in the Milwaukee public schools. Without Project Hold, these individuals would not have had the opportunity to continue in with their education in pursuit of a high school diploma.

Project Hold is working. As of today, 60 students have received high school diplomas, and 16 have received their GED. Over 50 percent of these students have gone on for advanced training in a postsecondary institution.

This project is so successful that MATC now has more dropouts wanting to participate than the program can handle. Its classrooms are full.

I commend the Project Hold staff in Milwaukee for helping to lead the way in designing a program that works. I also commend the leadership shown by my colleague from Rhode Island [Mr. PELL] in bringing this bill before the Senate today.

I realize that the Senate passed the Educational Excellence Act last week with a reauthorization of this program included. However, it is critical that this legislation be passed in a timely manner in order that appropriations can be approved and the program continue without interruption.

I urge my colleagues to support passage of the School Dropout Demonstration Assistance Act.

Mr. President, according to a report from the Corporate Task Force on Education, "Undereducated, Uncompetitive USA," the dropout rate for the Nation at the high school level is 25 percent. Recognizing the unacceptability of this figure, the President, in his State of the Union Message to Congress, stated, "The United States must increase the high school graduation rate to no less than 90 percent." In order to help reduce the dropout rate, the President has requested $45 million for a program of dropout prevention demonstrations.

What approaches are needed to address the serious problem of young people dropping out of school, with some even dropping out while in elementary school? Project Hold is a program which is attempting to find the answers. This program is working to identify and retain potential dropouts in school through high school graduation. Recognizing that the skills necessary for a literature work force are steadily increasing, another objective of the program is to encourage participating students to further their education after receiving a high school diploma.

Project Hold has three component parts. First, the program is designed to instill in each student at the middle school level the value and importance of an education. The program seeks to achieve that goal by helping out career classes and arranging tours to postsecondary programs and businesses to help illustrate the importance of staying in school. Second, at the high school level, the program works to identify dropouts and put them back into a situation where they can learn and succeed. They may be placed in MATC's own high school program, or return to their own district high school, or be placed in a community-based organization for instruction and counseling. Third, for adults up to the age of 25, the program works to provide basic skills in order to move these individuals into an adult high school program. Students receiving the GED are encouraged to work for an associate degree.

We know that the approach taken by Project Hold is working. With the Department of Education in the middle of an evaluation process of these demonstration projects it would be imprudent to end a program that appears to be having success, especially when Congress is considering a number of initiatives designed to promote excellence in our education system.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum with the time to be equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DODD). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

I thank the Chair and I yield the floor.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, I rise today in support for the extension of funding for the National School Dropout Demonstration Program, H.R. 2281.

This bill will authorize $50 million for the next 2 years to continue effective dropout prevention programs in public schools.

Our most valuable resource in America today is our youth. Our world standing depends on how we train, develop, and support not just the brightest kids, but also the ones most in danger of losing ground due to poverty, drugs, or teen pregnancy.

We cannot afford to enter the next century with a generation of kids labeled "not fit for duty." This legislation will help focus our Federal dollars on making our at-risk youth part of the solution for academic excellence before they become part of the problem.

I encourage my colleagues in the Senate to follow the example of the House of Representatives and pass this reauthorization bill unanimously.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I rise in support of H.R. 2281, a bill to reauthorize the National School Dropout Demonstration Assistance Act.

I believe that the school dropout problem is an issue which this Nation must address as a priority item. We are told that 25 percent of all students in this country drop out of school each year. This is a national disgrace.

Many of these students are later added to our welfare caseload. These are our potential teachers, doctors, lawyers, community leaders, and, of course, taxpayers. Nonetheless, the education and employment potentials of these students are not met.

As my colleagues know, H.R. 2281 would extend for 2 years the National Demonstration Program under the Elementary and Secondary Education Assistance Act. It would provide a $50 million authorization for each, fiscal year 1990 and 1991. The House also added a provision which was requested by the administration to allow the Secretary of Education to reserve funding in the program for the evaluation process.

Mr. President, H.R. 2281 was introduced in the House by my Illinois colleague, Congressman HAYES, who has proven to be an outstanding leader on this education issue. He recognized the urgent need for this legislation so that the Federal Government can continue its efforts to help public schools come to grip with their dropout problems.

For fiscal year 1989, six projects in Illinois received dropout demonstration grant awards, as follows: $337,974 to the Chicago public schools in Chicago; $267,993 to Northeastern Illinois University in Chicago; $93,775 to the Youth Services Project, Inc., in Chicago; $178,346 to Hamilton-Jefferson Counties school district; $214,678 to Triton College in River Grove; and $113,014 to Carbondale Community High School District No. 165 in Carbondale.

Mr. President, while I realize that $50 million is far from what is needed to adequately fund the School Dropout Demonstration Assistance Act, I believe that this body should support H.R. 2281 so that we are able to sustain the progress already made in this area.

My colleagues may remember that on February 7, 1990, the Senate overwhelmingly approved S. 695, the Excellence in Education Act. The legislation includes a specific provision to extend funding for the School Dropout Program, unless prior to its enactment, funds are appropriated for another more comprehensive State-administered antidropout program in the Basis Skills for Secondary Schools Program.

Mr. President, since the House has not yet acted on S. 695, I call upon my colleagues to approve H.R. 2281 today so that this worthy dropout program is funded on a timely basis.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I stand in strong support of H.R. 2281, which would reauthorize the School Dropout Prevention Demonstration Program under part A of title VI of the Elementary and Secondary Education Assistance Act.

Illiteracy, a problem that the Senate recently addressed with my S. 1310, is in part linked to the school dropout problem. There are 23 to 27 million illiterate adults in America. As youngsters, many of them had trouble in school and simply gave up, becoming part of the dropout statistics before becoming part of the adult illiteracy statistics. Many of them also become part of the crime statistics: 80 percent of all prison inmates are high school dropouts.

Our Nation's schools are desperately in need of assistance to deal with this problem. The Chicago public schools have a dropout rate of 43 percent, almost three times the national average. The dropout rate is as high as 80 percent for Hispanic students in some urban areas.

In 1984, then-President Reagan set out a goal of raising the high school graduation rate to 90 percent by the year 2000. A few weeks ago, President Bush presented the same goal for the Nation. We cannot reach that goal without committing some resources to programs that specifically address the problem.

By funding innovative demonstration programs, the School Dropout Prevention Demonstration Program helps schools find answers to the dropout problem. And this is the only Federal program focused specifically on school dropouts. The demand for funding demonstrates the need for the program: In fiscal year 1989, there were 850 applicants, but only about 10 percent of those applications could be funded with the $21 million available.

Mr. President, reauthorization of the School Dropout Prevention Demonstration Program is long overdue. I commend Senator PELL, Senator KENNEDY, and Senator KASSEBAUM for their efforts today to keep this valuable program alive.

DROPOUT PREVENTION

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I strongly support this legislation to authorize $50 million in this fiscal year and fiscal year 1991 for the National School Dropout Demonstration Program. This authorization is a limited extension of this important program. For the children, the consequences of a child dropping out of school are tragic—the individual is likely to get stuck in low-wage jobs, with few opportunities for advancement. In too many cases, dropping out leads to wasted lives, with terrible effects on families and communities.

As a nation, we suffer the economic consequences of every child's decision to quit school earlier—in lower productivity, lost tax revenues, more demands on social services. As a society, we suffer the social consequences—in increased crime, in substance abuse. It is imperative that we address this problem in a serious way. I welcome the President's goal of cutting the dropout rate in the 1990's. But we must match resources to this critical goal. In my home State, our economic security depends upon our continuing to have one of the most educated, flexible, and creative labor forces in the world. Those characteristics are what have produced one of the highest standards of living in the Nation. However, while the growth in our labor force has slowed to a trickle, less than one-half of 1 percent per year, we have not effectively reduced dropout rates and equipped these young people to help build our future and theirs.

John Stuart Mill once wrote, "Ask a man to do nothing for his country and he will have no love for it."

Mr. President, helping to prevent our youngsters from dropping out is a critical way of making them feel a part of what is happening that is good and productive in our country and it is a critical element in creating the citizens we need in this country.

Mr. President, I was personally unable to participate on the Senate floor in this debate and vote today because I had the honor of representing the Senate as a U.S. Delegate to the United Nations Special Session on Drug Control which began today in New York. Obviously I would have joined in supporting this measure. But clearly, dropouts and drugs are too often tragically related aspects of the same young lives. We simply must do a better job of solving both of these problems, each of which treatens our future.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I yield back the time remaining, if any, on this side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I request the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN] and the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. MATSUNAGA] are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY] is absent on official business.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY] would vote "yea."

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. COATS], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. HATCH] are necessarily absent.

I further announce that if present and voting, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. COATS], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI] would each vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote.

The result was announced—yeas 94, nays 0, as follows:

So the bill (H.R. 2281) was passed.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I will speak on the Armenian resolution before us, with the concurrence of the leader.

I am waiting for the leadership to decide on that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say that the resolution is not before the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield to permit us to proceed in a manner that will have the matter before the Senate for debate?

Mr. PRESSLER. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

ARMENIAN GENOCIDE DAY OF REMEMBRANCE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, as I announced this morning, I will momentarily ask unanimous consent to proceed to Senate Joint Resolution 212, at which time I understand and anticipate that the distinguished President pro tempore will object, following which I will move to proceed to the resolution, that motion to proceed being a debatable motion.

The matter will then be before the Senate in the form of debate on the motion to proceed to the joint resolution. As a result of prior discussion among the three of us, including the distinguished Republican leader, the principal author of the resolution, who will during the day today address the subject and file a cloture motion, which will ripen for a vote on cloture on the motion to proceed to the resolution some time during the day on Thursday.

Accordingly, Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 212, a joint resolution designating April 24, 1990, as a national day of remembrance of the 75th anniversary of the Armenian genocide of 1915 to 1923.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I will object. I will not give my reasons until after the motion to proceed has been made, which the distinguished majority leader indicated he will make shortly, and after the distinguished Republican leader has had an opportunity to speak on the matter. I do object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

MOTION TO PROCEED

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I now move to proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 212.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion. Who seeks recognition?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who seeks recognition?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, if there is no objection, I yield first to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PRESSLER].

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I first became interested in the Armenian holocaust many years ago while a student at Oxford University. Frankly, I was looking for a topic to write a D. Phil. on, which I never did, but I had to find a topic that was new and had not been written on before. And in searching about for such a topic, I looked to the area of Turkey, Cyprus, and Greece, but found that the Ottoman Empire records were closed for the period of history I was most interested in. So I was interested in this subject of the Armenian holocaust long before I came to politics.

It has always appeared strange to me that the Turkish Government did not open the records prior to 1918, that the records of the Ottoman Empire are closed on this issue, even though certain items have been published in the New York Times, even though telegrams have been made public, and so forth.

So, first of all, I think it would be very appropriate for the Turkish Government to open, without censoring, the historical records of that period during which the Armenian holocaust occurred.

With that being said, I wanted to tell my colleagues how I first got interested in this subject. I think we should all be interested in holocausts wherever they have occurred, be they in World War II, in Cambodia, or any other place in the world or time in history. Certainly, we should have a resolution on the Armenian holocaust. Remembering the tragic events of the past is a form of honoring the victims of history. It is not a condemnation of those current nations that have descended from the original perpetrators of violence. If it were the latter case, we would not have a Memorial Day or Veterans Day. We observe these days as a way of remembering and honoring the dead.

It is for that reason we should reject the feeble notion that Senate Joint Resolution 212, the Armenian genocide resolution, is in any way an insult to Turkey, a valued ally.

Mr. President, I frequently have said that we should be friends with Turkey, but in this one area we should not feel that speaking our minds on this issue of Armenian genocide is necessarily inconsistent with being a friend of Turkey. The truth, of course, is that this resolution is intended to honor the victims of the Ottoman Turk massacres of Armenians during World War I. Those who attribute the other motivation to the resolution do a disservice to the entire human rights movement.

Turkey would be better off if it opened the records of the Ottoman Empire. I think Turkey would be better off if it acknowledged this genocide.

At a time when the world rejoices over the bursting into flower of the democratic movements in Eastern Europe, it is sad to see these aspersions cast upon those of us who wish to honor the Armenian dead in a fashion quite similar to the way we honor other victims of historic human rights abuses.

I am interested in the cause of human rights. Indeed I attended a meeting of the NATO parliamentarians in Antalya, Turkey, last year. There was a presentation of how human rights are being advanced in Turkey—I applaud that—how the prisons were becoming more in line with what Amnesty International would approve of. But I raised some questions about this Armenian question and was given a very cold shoulder. It is unnecessary for Turkey to hide this event in its history. I think it is unwise of Turkey not to just open the whole thing up and acknowledge it as the important human rights issue it is.

Still worse, Mr. President, is the effort by the opponents of this Armenian genocide resolution to deny the very occurrence of that genocide. Generations of respected historians and other scholars have investigated the allegations of genocide by Ottoman officials and have determined them to be factually accurate. The Armenian genocide did occur, resulting in the death of 1.5 million human beings and the forced deportation of another 500,000 souls from the Armenian provinces of Turkey. Only 100,000 Armenians remained in those areas when the hideous Ottoman project was complete.

But the violence really has not ended. It is still going on against Armenians in the Middle East, and herein lies another reason for the resolution. Unless we recognize this historic tragedy and remember its victims, we will, in effect, be accepting a lie as truth. And when we do that, Mr. President, we will give encouragement to those who would like to continue persecuting Armenians.

I cannot believe that this U.S. Senate would ignore the historical record of this tragedy. I cannot believe the Senate would paper over the Armenian genocide because of the flimsy excuse that it insults Turkey. The resolution has nothing to do with Turkey, and nothing to do with NATO security. If Turkey's misinterpretation of the purpose of the resolution inspires it to cause trouble with the United States or disrupt NATO activities, then surely we must question Turkey's value as an ally.

This is not a debate on the value of the Turkish Republic, although some may try to make it that. It is really a question of whether or how to appropriately recognize the victims of the genocidal policies of the Ottoman Empire.

Mr. President, I do not see Germany feeling insulted when memorial observances are held at Auschwitz, Dachau, or elsewhere to honor the victims of Hitler's monstrous genocide. Germans overwhelmingly accept and recognize what happened in World War II. They are a better people for not trying to live a lie. They are respected far more now than they otherwise would be, because they had the courage to face up to the bitter reality of the Holocaust.

Turkey does itself a serious disservice by not showing the same kind of courage with respect to the Ottoman Empire's genocide against Armenians more than 70 years ago. This is strange, indeed, in view of the fact that many Europeans recognize the genocide as fact. The longer Turkish leaders sweep the past under the carpet, the more damage is done to the credibility of their efforts to eliminate current human rights abuses in their country.

Mr. President, I commend Senator DOLE's leadership on Senate Joint Resolution 212. I am proud to be an original cosponsor of the Armenian genocide resolution and urge our colleagues to give it prompt and favorable consideration.

Mr. President, in conclusion I know this debate will be very heated and emotional on both sides of the issue. I know that Turkey is one of our valued allies, but I also know there are many people in the world human rights community who feel very strongly about this. I feel very strongly that the Senate should do what is right. That is why I support Senator DOLE's resolution and hope that we move to a vote on it quickly.

Mr. President, I yield the floor to my colleague, Senator DOLE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KOHL). The Chair recognizes Senator DOLE.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, first, I thank my colleague from South Dakota for his continuing forthright support, and I appreciate the statement that has been made part of the record.

Mr. President, we are going to have a lot of debate in the next few days on a very important issue. Some will say: "Why are you taking up Senate time on something like this? There are a lot of other important issues that affect life in today's world."

That was said about the Genocide Convention around this place for 30 some years. Nobody wanted to bring it up. Nobody wanted to take it on except Senator Proxmire. I might add my former colleague, Senator William Proxmire from Wisconsin, made a speech on it every day for several years. And I am proud when I was majority leader of the Senate we acted on that resolution after 30 years, and we finally recognized what had happened in Hitler's Germany, how the Jews had been eradicated.

Genocide is a term coined in 1946. It was not a term used in 1915 and 1923, the period we are talking about today.

I would say to friends who supported my efforts at that time, just listen to the debate and listen to the facts. I think for too long we have ignored history, just as we waited too long before we took action on the Genocide Convention just a couple years ago. For too long we bowed to a powerful ally and powerful interest groups.

And for too long we have failed to speak about the truth about the tragedy of genocide. I think it is time for the U.S. Senate, the Congress, the Government—it is finally time to do what is right.

We pride ourselves in America in doing what is right, not what is expedient. But, Mr. President, getting to this point has not been easy. One of my Republican colleagues, an opponent of the resolution, has observed that the resolution generated one of the most intensive lobbying campaigns he has ever experienced. And I do not think there is a Senator around, either for or against the resolution, who would dispute that observation. I can tell you what impact it has had.

At one time or another 61 Senators agreed to cosponsor the resolution. On the day the Judiciary Committee reported out the resolution, there were 50 cosponsors. Today there are 46.

The history of 1915 to 1923 has not changed since last fall. The facts certainly have not changed since last fall. But what has changed is the launching of a massive lobbying effort against the resolution by the administration, by the Government of Turkey, by American businesses who operate in Turkey, and regrettably by some private organizations and individuals who ought to be supportive of the resolution. At least they were when we were talking about a genocide convention on this floor not too long ago.

I might say as an aside, one of the strawmen raised against the resolution is that it is the foot in the door for a broader Armenian agenda, including a claim for reparations. There are a lot of strawmen floating around. I want to take care of a few of them now. And as the author of the resolution I can categorically say that that is a phony charge, as far as I and my cosponsors are concerned.

I do not and will not support any claims for reparations, simply because I believe and have said repeatedly: the modern-day Turkish State and Government are in no way responsible for the events of 1915 and 1923.

So it is a strawman. I have tried to make that point with the Turkish Ambassador, a fine man, and with the President of Turkey, for whom I have great respect. But the fact is that if the Turkish Government offered "reparations"—and to stress the point I have made, I have that word in quotes—but if Ankara did offer in "reparations" what it spent on lobbying against this piece of legislation, the whole issue would have already been resolved. In fact, if we simply held back in aid what Ankara spent in lobbying, we would probably achieve de facto the 5-percent cut in earmarked and that I advocated on the foreign aid issue.

Mr. President, every big gun of our opponents has been pulled out, and they have been fired off, again and again and again. It kind of reminds me of David versus Goliath. I think it is a very important point.

Let us take a look at Armenia. I doubt that many Senators have been to Armenia—I happened to have been there in August. It is one of the most tragic spots on the face of the Earth. A republic of maybe 3½ million people, 25,000 to 50,000 of this number were killed in an earthquake less than 15 months ago. It devastated the region. One-sixth of the entire population is still homeless from the quake. Hundreds of thousands more are fleeting from the violence in A'jerbausan.

The place is flat on its back. Now that is Armenia. And I said before if you want to visit some place that will make you cry, go to Soviet Armenia and go to Spitak, go to Leninakan, and visit the little monument that is there to memorialize the destruction of a school where 400 young children were wiped out in 40 seconds in the earthquake. That is Armenia.

And on the other side is Turkey, big, powerful, a major alley, no doubt about it. And I am proud of that. Big money American companies operating there—none of these are operating in Armenia—pulling out millions of dollars of profits, these American companies; the recipient over the years of billions of dollars in United States aid, a half-billion this year alone. And maybe they deserve more. In fact, they would have had more under my plan, I might add, than they receive now.

So I will not quarrel with that. But I must say when I came back from Soviet Armenia I asked the State Department, I asked the administration, what can we do in a country where 500,000 people are homeless, where 30,000 to 50,000 have been killed, where 100-and-some villages have been demolished? Well, after a lot of effort and some help from my friends on the Appropriations Committee, including the distinguished President pro tempore, we were able to get $5 million for earthquate relief. And we cannot give direct aid to the Soviet Union, so we do it through private relief organizations.

So I want to sort of set the stage to understand that we are talking about: two countries in the same geographical area, different religious backgrounds, and in nearly every other case big, big differences.

So as I see it, it is sort of Turkey and its allies, versus Armenia and its friend. I have told many in Armenia, you are a small country. You do not do business with big American companies, which can call Senators and say you better watch that we are about to sell x dollars' worth of goods to Turkey. You cannot get calls from somebody in the State Department or somewhere else saying, you better watch this; this is not good for our relations with Turkey.

And the irony of ironies, the issue is not Turkey at all. That is something I fail to understand. Maybe somebody will explain it to me. This resolution says nothing about modern day Turkey. In fact, the language is explicit: The events in question occurred in "1915 to 1923, prior to the establishment of the Republic of Turkey." We are talking about the Ottoman Empire.

I will have all kinds of documents that cannot be refuted from countries around the world during that period of time. I ask my colleagues, if they have time, to peruse some of the documents and some of the facts we will have available, because this is important.

If this were a contest of clout, there would not be any contest. Maybe that is the way it will turn out, but I hope not. This is a simple question of what is right or wrong, not who has the most influence, who has the most lobbyists, who has the most money. And the bottom line is not which country is more important to American security, Turkey or Armenia—no contest there either—but do we excuse everything that happened in the past. Had we done that, I will recall again, we would have not acted favorably on the Genocide Convention in the United States Senate.

So I guess we just have to, those of us who support the resolution, make our case the best we can. I have read the arguments of the Turkish lobby and the organized mailings and printed handouts, which cover page after page, but they boil down to four basic arguments.

No. 1: The resolution will offend our ally, Turkey. And I believe I can say that no one regrets more deeply than I that this resolution generated such a strong reaction from Ankara. I visited Turkey. In fact, I went to Turkey at the suggestion of my friend, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD]. And he is right, more Senators ought to visit Turkey. They are an important ally. They are important to the United States. We are important to them. So I have no quarrel with that.

I met with the Turkish leaders. I know how important Turkey is to NATO and to the United States.

Several weeks ago, President Ozal was visiting Washington. He was kind enough to let me come to the Madison Hotel and spend about 45-55 minutes with him. We spoke for nearly an hour on the resolution. He made his case vigorously and with conviction. I remember one thing he said: "This is one thing which unites all Turks." He thanked me for that. I tried to make the point again and again about our friendship with Turkey, but also of history and that these deeds of the Ottoman Empire had no relationship to the modern day Turkey and tried to stress the point that this resolution is not anti-Turkey either in intent or content. That is the simple truth.

No one disputes that there was a genocide in Nazi Germany. But no one makes a claim that such a genocide means the present day German Government or people are responsible. If that were the case, we probably would not have passed, would not have acted on the Genocide Convention in the U.S. Senate. The West German Government and the East German Government both acknowledge that there was a genocide in the early history of their homeland. The world acknowledges it without demanding punishment from anyone except from those who actually perpetrated the deeds. Indeed, one reason this is simply not an issue for modern day Germany is that the people of that nation have faced up to their history, put it in perspective, and moved on to face their future. And that is all we suggest Turkey do in this instance.

I should also add that in 1987, when the European Community was considering a resolution much more strongly worded than mine on the Armenian genocide issue, Turkey threatened to retaliate strongly. That resolution was passed by the European parliament, and Turkey's actual response was muted. It did not give up on the Community, but continued its pursuit of full membership. It did not retaliate politically or economically against the members of the Parliament.

I am not suggesting Turkey is bluffing. I am suggesting that, as important as this issue is to Ankara, there are other important issues out there, too, in the real world.

We hear that we must stay on the good side of our ally, Turkey, because of the instability in that region. Well, that is true. But Turkey cannot be unmindful of the importance to its own security in that unstable area, of its alliance with us. So all of this cuts both ways, as it generally does.

I hope and I believe that responsible contemporary statesmen on both sides ought to be able to deal with long past history, even one with which they disagree, without it disrupting relations which are mutually important, mutually beneficial, and mutually based on concrete security interests of both countries. So that is argument No. 1.

No. 2: Some are saying, I think maybe the Ambassador may have mentioned this to me in my meeting, that this resolution is an invitation to terrorism, perpetrated by Armenian extremists. Frankly, that argument is offensive to me and I think to others who cosponsor and support this resolution. We abhor terrorism: every Member of this body does. I condemn terrorism. I acknowledge and history must acknowledge, just as it acknowledges the Armenian genocide, that a tiny, tiny minority of extremists in the Armenian community worldwide have undertaken individual acts of terrorism against Turkey and Turkish citizens.

I condemn those acts. Every responsible Armenian organization condemns those acts. As one example, the spokesman for the Armenian Assembly, one of the largest Armenian-American organizations, unequivocally acknowleged and condemned such actions in a speech before the B'nai B'rith last December, and I will be putting that speech in the RECORD. Every responsible American condemns that action. That is not the issue, but it is another strawman.

In fact, according to the State Department, which over the years has not been an advocate of the Armenian viewpoint on the issue, there have been no reported cases of Armenian terrorism against the Turks for several years. So this is not only a strawman, but a dead strawman at that.

Argument No. 3: This resolution is only a foot in the door for the real agenda, which includes reparations and territorial dismemberment of Turkey.

I have offered to introduce resolutions, and would include in the pending resolution, wording which would have put the Senate and America on record, unequivocally against any raising of the issues of reparations or territorial dismemberment of Turkey as being absolutely dangerous, unjustified, unfair, and unacceptable.

I would offer it as an amendment to the pending resolution. I would work with anybody on such legislation, and I believe we could accomplish quick passage of such legislation, and I renew that offer again today.

We recognize Turkey. We need a stable, secure Turkey. We have no designs on Turkey. We have no claims on Turkey, financial or otherwise, growing out of the events of 1915 to 1923.

To anyone in the Armenian community—and I know of no one who thinks otherwise—I would say there would be almost total disagreement in this body with any effort to the contrary. I think that is the view that every Member of the Senate and the Congress that I know would ascribe to. That is the view the U.S. Government ascribes to. And that is the view every member of the Armenian community ought to ascribe to, in my view.

So, on this point, at least, let us put it to bed once and for all.

Senate Joint Resolution 212 is what it is. And what it is has nothing in the world to do with claims for reparations or territorial dismemberment of Turkey, period. In fact, I think maybe it might be well to read the text of the resolution, the pending resolution. I will quote page 2, line 1:

> That April 24, 1990, is designated as "National Day of Remembrance of the 75th Anniversary of the Armenian Genocide of 1915-1923," and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe this date as a day of remembrance for the 1.5 million people of Armenian ancestry who were victims of the genocide perpetrated by the governments of the Ottoman Empire from 1915 to 1923, prior to the establishment of the Republic of Turkey, and in their memory this date is commemorated by all Americans and their friends throughout the world.

That is it. No talk about reparations. No talk about claims. No talk about territorial dismemberment. But if that would satisfy some who oppose the resolution a clear distancing from those points can certainly be added. We can make certain that nothing in this resolution shall deal with any claims or any reparations or any dismemberment or anything else that someone might think of that would be negative in any respect to present day Turkey. And that would have our support.

And then, finally, argument No. 4, the one that we hear most about—well, the genocide did not really happen. It never happened. This was a civil war. It did not really kill any Armenians. Or there was bloodshed on both sides.

I heard that from the President himself, President Ozal.

A lot of people say, well, let history judge those things. I hear it all the time, let history be the judge. Let history judge what happened. How long do we wait for history to make a judgment about what happened from 1915 to 1923? It has been almost 75 years, and it seems to me that it is about time that history did judge.

We decided there was a genocide in Germany even before its last potential victims were liberated. We decided there was a genocide in Cambodia even as the genocide was taking place. And it is high time we acknowledge a genocide which occurred in the Ottoman Empire, before the fact of its occurrence is lost to history.

The Holocaust Memorial Council, which some of us have been privileged to serve on as members of the board, which is as close to an authoritative source on this subject as you can find, has recognized and decided to include the Armenian genocide in the Holocaust Memorial Museum. the overwhelming weight of documentary evidence of this period supports the fact that there was a genocide, even though that term was not used in 1915-23. It was coined in 1946.

To give my colleagues who have not focused on this issue an opportunity to do so, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement that I referred to earlier today by an Armenian Assembly spokesman. It contains the best brief summary of the evidence on this issue that I have seen.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FIGHTING DENIAL OF THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

(By Van Z. Krikorian, Director, Government and Legal Affairs, The Armenian Assembly of America)

In the spring, you heard a speech from a Turkish Embassy official contending that the Armenians did not suffer a genocide between 1915 and 1923. That contention is patently false. But, Turkey's and its agents' insistence on vigorously pursuing it poses a frightening threat to all people who believe in democracy and human rights. Make no mistake, those who are denying the Armenian genocide today are paving the way for those who deny other genocides and for those who will undoubtedly plan future episodes of race extermination. I am sure you are aware that Hitler publicly laid the foundation for the Holocaust by referring to "the extermination of the Armenians" starting, at least, in 1931 and most forcefully in 1939 when he commanded his military to show no mercy by asking: "Who, after all, speaks today of the annihilation of the Armenians?"

Those who deny the Armenian Genocide are removing the underpinnings of all human progress by pretending that nothing exists which, for whatever reason, they do not want to exist. This approach is often viewed as politically expedient. But, in the end, it only aborts the cause of civilization.

This is why I am especially glad to address you this afternoon and to publicly challenge the arguments of the deniers. I am also glad to know that the Holocaust Memorial Council has publicly and unequivocally committed to include the Armenian genocide in the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, a decision which rebukes the deniers and promotes historical integrity.

Today, I plan to discuss some of the reasons why the Armenian genocide is properly classified as a genocide and then refute some of the more popular arguments offered by the Turkish government and other deniers.

First of all, what does the term genocide mean? Literally, it means the killing of a race. An attorney and Holocaust survivor, Rafael Lemkin, coined the term in 1944 and then dedicated himself to creating and promoting the United Nations Genocide Convention. Before, during, and after coining the term, Lemkin used the Armenian case as a definitive example of genocide. In Lemkin's view, it would be impossible to question whether the Armenians suffered a genocide, because the term was created to be a synonym with the Armenian experience.

Similarly, the United Nations legislative history of the Genocide Convention is clear that the Armenian case is an example of genocide, a position from which the United Nations has not moved. In the United States, the legislative history of ratifying the Genocide Convention and the implementing legislation is equally clear that the Armenian case is synonymous with the term genocide. These legislative histories, of course, merely reflect the overwhelming evidence of the Armenian genocide. Yet, the deniers argue that the Armenian case somehow does not fit the definition of genocide.

The Genocide Convention provides:

Genocide means any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such:

(a) Killing members of the group;

(b) Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group;

(c) Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part;

(d) Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group;

(e) Forcibly transferring children of the group to another group.

No one realistically questions whether Ottoman Turkey engaged in the specific acts enumerated in this definition. That would be absurd because the Armenian population of over two million was unquestionably reduced to under 100,000, and those people did not simply disappear—they were killed, forcibly converted to Islam, and, in small numbers, escaped.

What the deniers question is whether the government committed the acts with the intent to destroy the Armenian presence in their homeland of three thousand years. This contention is shamefully absurd.

I cannot go over all the admissions and evidence establishing beyond any doubt that the government planned and implemented a campaign of race extermination, but the archives of the United States and almost every European country (including the Central Powers, Turkey's allies) are overflowing with this evidence. Today, I would like to call your attention to the following pieces of evidence: (1) a December 1914 authenticated blueprint for genocide issued by the ruling Committee of Union and Progress Party which can be found in the British archives; (2) the post World War I, Turkish trials and convictions (based on substantial, irrefutable testimonial and documentary evidence) of the government officials responsible for ordering and implementing the extermination of the Armenians; (3) a November 8, 1920 order for the military to exterminate the Armenians living in Russia; (4) and the acknowledgment of the Armenian genocide by the founder of modern Turkey, Kemal Ataturk.

The December 1914 order reads as follows:

(1) Profiting by Articles 3 and 4 of Committee Union and Progress, close all Armenian Societies, and arrest all who worked against Government at any time among them and send them into the provinces such as Bagdad or Mosul, and wipe them out either on the road or there.

(2) Collect arms.

(3) Excite Moslem opinion by suitable and special means, in places as Van, Erzeroum, Adana, where as a point of fact the Armenians have already won the hatred of the Moslems, provoke organized massacres as the Russians did at Baku.

(4) Leave all executive to the people in provinces such as Erzeroum, Van, Mamuret ul Aziz, and Bitlis, and use Military disciplinary forces (i.e. Gendarmerie) ostensibly to stop massacres, while on the contrary in places as Adana, Sivas, Broussa, Ismidt and Smyrna actively help the Moslems with military force.

(5) Apply measures to exterminate all males under 50, priests and teachers, leave girls and children to be Islamized.

(6) Carry away the families of all who succeed in escaping and apply measures to cut them off from all connection with their native place.

(7) On the ground that Armenian officials may be spies, expel and drive them out absolutely from every Government department or post.

(8) Kill off in an appropriate manner all Armenians in the Army—this to be left to the military to do.

(9) All action to begin everywhere simultaneously and thus leave no time for preparation of defensive measures.

(10) Pay attention to the strictly confidential nature of these instructions, which may not go beyond two or three persons.

In fact, these orders basically describe the actual pattern of the genocide. Of course, during implementation, the ruling party issued additional orders on massacring Armenians (I will share another with you shortly) as well as orders to punish those Turks who showed mercy to the Armenians.

The post-war trials are also dispositive not only for their indictments and verdicts, but also for the overwhelming evidence used to secure the verdicts. Specifically, both central and provincial government officials were tried and convicted for the "massacre and destruction of the Armenians." Besides a major trial in Istanbul, moreover, local trials for the same crimes, which have yet not been widely publicized, also took place. (Parenthetically, I would add here that these trials were cited as precedent for the Nuremberg trials following World War II.)

Next, I would like to share a November 8, 1920 central government order, quoted from a Turkish source. This order commanded General Kazim Karabekir to essentially continue the job of exterminating the Armenians after World War I by wiping out the Russian-Armenian population:

By virtue of the provisions of the Sevres Treaty Armenia will be enabled to cut off

Turkey from the East. Together with Greece she will impede Turkey's general growth. Further, being situated in the midst of a great Islamic periphery, she will never voluntarily relinquish her assigned role of a despotic gendarme, and will never try to integrate her destiny with the general conditions of Turkey and Islam.

Consequently, it is indispensable that Armenia be eliminated politically and physically [siyaseten ve maddenten ortadan kaldirmak].

Since the attainment of this objective is subject to [the limitations of] our power and the general political situation, it is necessary to be adaptive in the implementation of the decision mentioned above [tevfiki icraat]. Our withdrawal from Armenia as part of a peace settlement is out of the question. Rather, you will resort to a modus operandi intended to deceive the Armenians [Ermenileri igfal] and fool the Europeans by an appearance of peacelovingness. In reality, however, [fakat hakikatde] the purpose of all this is to achieve by stages the objective [stated above] . . . [I]t is required that vague and gentle-sounding words [mubhem ve mulayim] be employed both in the framing and in the application of the peace settlement, while constantly maintaining an appearance of peacelovingness towards the Armenians.

[t]hese instructions reflect the real intent [makasidi hakikiyesi] of the Cabinet. They are to be treated as secret, and are meant only for your eyes.

Again, documents like these as well as direct admissions of guilt by the government officials are literally everywhere.

Recognizing that indisputable fact, Kemal Ataturk, the founder of modern Turkey, did not hesitate to condemn the responsible Ottoman government for its actions. In an interview published August 1, 1926 in the Los Angeles Examiner, he said that all those responsible "should have been made to account for the lives of millions of our Christian subjects who were ruthlessly driven en masse from their homes and massacred." Today, the Turkish government has called the authenticity of this quote into question. Yet this 1926 statement was not an isolated event. In 1918, Ataturk called for the execution of the genocide's perpetrators. In 1919, as recorded by a presumably unimpeachable source, future Turkish prime minister Rauf Orbay, Ataturk acknowledged the government's massacres "of 800,000 Armenians" and "decried the extermination of the Armenians." In a 1920 speech, Attaturk explicitly condemned the massacres as "scandalous." Again, this type of documentation is indisputable and overwhelming, but we still face those who act as if it does not exist. When such denials are funded from a country as important as Turkey, we face the prospects of the Nazi operating principle: "a lie told 1,000 times becomes the truth."

Accordingly, I would next like to refute the predominant arguments used by the deniers today. Let me start with one that the embassy official who spoke here in the spring touted as dispositive—"It was not a systematic effort to kill all Armenians [because] no harm was done to the Armenian communities living outside the war zone—in Istanbul, the Ottoman capital, for example." Initially, I would note that this argument is as fallacious as saying that Jews did not suffer a genocide because they were relatively safe in Rome and Bulgaria. But, more importantly, the factual assertion is not true.

Armenians certainly were exterminated in Istanbul and every other part of Turkey, and it was clearly systematic. For example, on December 7, 1915 German Ambassador Metternich informed Berlin that the government had wiped 30,000 Armenians out of Istanbul and that "gradually a clean sweep will be made of the remaining 80,000 Armenian inhabitants of the Ottoman capital." Indeed, the government massacred or tried to massacre all Armenians from European Turkey by first shipping them over the Bosporus and then killing them. One example is the eradication of the Armenians from the European town of Rodosto. In fact, Armenians and their friends commemorate the genocide on the anniversary of April 24, 1915 because on that date the government gave the clearest signal of systematic race extermination. It arrested and killed hundreds of unquestionably innocent Armenian community leaders (including legislators, clergy, educators, and attorneys) in Istanbul.

Another argument which the deniers forward is that Armenians died of natural causes (famine, cholera, diseases), not government ordered massacres. Putting aside all the direct evidence of the genocide, this argument is ridiculous. It would be the first time, that I know of, in which famine and disease moved from town to town across an entire country removing all but less than 100,000 Armenians from over 2,000,000, and leaving the Turkish Moslem population as the sole survivors. Frankly, such a "selective disease" argument has no historical or scientific credibility, and those who make the argument must not expect their audience to reflect on its merits very deeply.

But, then the deniers argue that there was also a great civil war in which Armenians took up arms against Turks. In that supposed war, great, mutual killings occurred. Never mind that the government had disarmed all the Armenians, the government drafted all the able-bodied Armenian men into labor battalions of the army where they were massacred, and contemporaneous reports do not reference any civil war. In fact, in a newly published book, "The Slaughterhouse Province," we can read American counsul Davis's official, eyewitness report from the interior of Turkey of the disarming of the Armenians and the lack of any real resistance. He reports that after the massacres of Armenians in the Province of Harput (ultimately over 100,000), the government could "find only four or five instances where any Turks had been killed or even injured by Armenians and less than a dozen instances of any resistance by Armenians." In other isolated areas, of course, Armenians fought back against Turks. But, these were either minor incidents; self-defense; or because Armenians were Russian citizens, drafted into the Russian army, and were a part of the Allied war effort fighting Ottoman Turkey. As Ambassador Morgenthau reported as early as July 1915, moreover, allegations of rebellion were only "a pretext" for "a campaign of race extermination."

Nevertheless, some people still claim that the massive Armenian deaths resulted from the legitimate quashing of a rebellion. This "pretext" or "legitimate basis" denial argument is probably the most dangerous. If it is accepted (regardless of its inaccuracy), it sanctions the murder of an entire nation based on the prodemocracy cries of only a few groups. Civilization will not progress if a justification claim can be made in defense of genocide. Otherwise, the Nazis and every subsequent perpetrator would build the defense in as the crime was committed. During the Armenian genocide, the government attempted exactly such a defense, and it was rejected as both inaccurate and immoral by the international community as well as the succeeding Turkish government. There is no reason why it should be accepted now.

A more slippery denial argument on the "mutual killings" theme involves the amount of Turks and Moslems who also died in the war. I call this argument slippery because its proponents slide between "Turkish" and "Moslem" deaths. For example, some point to "two million Turkish deaths during the war" as a reason not to sympathize with Armenians. Yet this two million figure includes the 1.5 million Turkish-Armenians killed, the over 300,000 Turkish army casualties, and the tens of thousands of Turkish-Greeks and Arabs put to death at the same time.

Another strand of this argument points to "hundreds of thousands of Moslem deaths"—again implying that the genocide was really an Armenian-Turkish war. Yet in calculating the "Moslem" figures, these people not only include the Turkish war casualties and the massacres of tens of thousands of Arabs in Turkey, but also the Moslems who died fighting with the Allies against the Turks in the Middle East—that is Moslems which the Turks themselves killed.

A third strand of this "numbers game" argument applies artificial formulas to the nineteenth century populations, plugs in some theoretical conditions, and concludes with ridiculous population and mortality figures which bear no relation to reality. This argument falls on its face because it completely ignores the direct, factual evidence of the genocide. Its proponents are as off base as those who recently claimed in the newspaper "Sieg" that only 150,000–200,000 Jews died under Nazi rule and those deaths came during the "German-Jewish war."

Another denial theme is that commemorating or recognizing the Armenian genocide promotes terrorism. Initially, let me say that we unequivocally condemn all terrorism, including Armenian terrorist attacks on innocent Turks. But, the threat of terrorism does not justify rewriting history to deny Ottoman Turkey's crimes against humanity. More importantly, and again the deniers conveniently fail to mention this fact, Armenian terrorism is a moot point. In a March 1989 report, even the State Department had to acknowledge that there has not been an Armenian terrorist attack in three or four years and Armenian terrorist groups have withered away. This cessation of terrorism is attributed to lack of mainstream Armenian community support and to the growing international rejection of Turkey's denial campaign. For example, in 1985 the United Nations Subcommittee on Human Rights, after years of study, overwhelmingly recognized the Armenian genocide as an indisputable historical fact, and in 1987 the European Parliament conditioned Turkey's acceptance to the European Community on recognizing the Armenian genocide.

The following denial argument is particular to deniers in the United States. They point out that in 1985 sixty-nine scholars signed an advertisement questioning the accuracy of a Congressional resolution commemorating the Armenian genocide and therefore "there was no Armenian genocide" or "the issue should be left to historians"—an argument from authorities so to speak. Following the advertisement, we contacted these sixty-nine people. We found that some did not authorize the use of their names on the advertisement and some said they were misled about the text and apologized. Many explicitly recognize the Armenian genocide as a fact. But, most importantly, we found that only four of the sixty-nine actually focus their work on the time span of 1915-1923. All of these individuals are subsidized by the Republic of Turkey, and none has credibility on the Armenian genocide issue. Thus, when deniers make claims like a majority of United States experts question the Armenian genocide, they are simply not telling the truth. Among those sociologists, attorneys, historians, psychologists, anthropologists, political scientists, and others who seriously study genocide, there is no question that the Armenians suffered a genocide, by any definition. There is also no question among the credible genocide scholars that failure to memoralize and condemn past genocides facilitates future genocides.

Before leaving this "scholars" issue, however, I would like to make clear that some of those people who signed the 1985 advertisement and continue to question the Armenian genocide really have little choice. These people are Turkish or Ottoman historians. If they do not assume the current government's line, they will be cut off from resources necessary for their life's work. Even Turkish sources confirm that cooperation with the government pays dividends while criticism exacts a high price.

The next denial argument is one of the more interesting. This argument contends that a judgment on the Armenian genocide must be reserved until the Republic of Turkey opens its archives of the period. The argument is interesting because Armenians sought free access to the Ottoman archives for years. Then the irrelevance of these archives became obvious. For instance, Turkey does not even own all of the relevant archives from the period. After the War, the government sold hundreds of thousands of its records to the Bulgarians as scrap paper. Other parts of the archives exist in Jerusalem, the Soviet Union, the Middle East, and Europe. In addition, after World War I, Turkish officials readily acknowledged that the files on Armenian massacres were removed and destroyed. In fact, the documentation in archives around the world contains more direct evidence of the genocide than we can possibly digest. (The United States archives contain approximately 25,000 pages for the period 1915-1918 alone, including captured German records, which fully document the genocide.) So, while the Turkish held archives may be interesting, there are only a very minor contribution to the history of the genocide.

Moreover, Turks themselves acknowledge that military and foreign service officials have been reviewing the records for years to remove whatever incriminating evidence may still exist and that the government is using the archives strictly for public relations purposes. This year, the government, in various ways, has announced that the archives on Armenian issues are open. Yet, they fail to publicize that the wrong archives are open or the restrictions which prevent any incriminating documents from coming to light. For example, in January, they announced that the archives are open, but they did not open the relevant World War I years. Recently, they announced that the Council of Ministers files were open for the war years, but they did not open the records of the party apparatus or other agencies which actually controlled the genocidal operations. (Scholars have found that the genocide was implemented through a two track system of orders—one set ordering "deportations" and another set ordering the translation of "deport the Armenians" to "massacre the Armenians.") Read these continued announcements on the opening of the archives carefully; you will find that there is always a caveat such as "all previously catalogued archives are open" or that a researcher may see only fifteen pages at a time and a government official has the right to screen the documents first. The Turkish government continues to use the archives as a delaying tactic. As Cumhuriyet a Turkish newspaper reported in January 1989:

Endless and empty statements have been made over the years concerning the opening of the Ottoman archives, and it is creating a disturbance among those who follow this topic closely. For the last 8 years, every 6 months a statement is made regarding the opening of the Ottoman archives. That these don't come true indicates that Turkey is pursuing a policy of distraction.

At this point, the Ottoman archives held by Turkey are worthless. This explains why only Turcophiles and the uninitiated place any weight on them. It also explains why the archives' administrators publicly complain that serious scholars have not come to review what has been released.

The last denial argument I would like to touch on is a "character" argument—that is, "Turks are hospitable, good people" and good people would not do what the Armenians allege happened under Ottoman reign. Let me say that the character of the Turkish people is not at issue here. Turkish hospitality is well known, and many Turks proved their sense of humanity during the genocide by protecting individual Armenians. That does not change what the government did to the Armenians from 1915 to 1923, the fact that the racist ideology of Pan-Turkism (Turkey only for Turks) was and still is prevalent, or that the government continues to have a poor human rights record and severely discriminates against Armenians in Turkey today.

You should also know that the 1915-1923 Armenian genocide was not an isolated event. From 1894 to 1896, Sultan Abdul Hamid openly and proudly ordered the massacre of hundreds of thousands of Armenians, ostensibly to send the Armenians a message about their place in Turkish society. Lord Kinross gave the following example of the atrocities in this period:

[The Massacre's] objective, based on the convenient consideration that Armenians were now tentatively starting to question their inferior status, was the ruthless reduction, with a view to elimination of the Armenian Christians, and the expropriation of their lands for the Moslem Turks. Each operation, between the bugle calls, followed a similar pattern. First the Turkish troops came into a town for the purpose of massacre; then came the Kurdish irregulars and tribesmen for the purpose of plunder. Finally came the holocaust, by fire and destruction, which spread, with the pursuit of the fugitives and mopping-up operations, throughout the lands and villages of the surrounding province. This murderous winter of 1895 thus saw the decimation of much of the Armenian population and the devastation of their property in some twenty districts of eastern Turkey. Often the massacres were timed for a Friday, when the Moslems were in their mosques . . . Cruelest and most ruinous of all were the massacres at Urfa, where the Armenian Christians numbered a third of the population . . . When the bugle blast ended the day's operations, some three thousand refugees poured into the cathedral, hoping for sanctuary. But the next morning—a Sunday—a fanatic mob swarmed into the church in an orgy of slaughter, rifling its shrines with cries of 'Call upon Christ to prove Himself a greater prophet than Mohammed.' Then they amassed a large pile of straw matting, which they spread over the litter of corpses and set alight with thirty cans of petroleum. The woodwork of the gallery where a crowd of women and children crouched, wailing with terror, caught fire, and all perished in the flames. Punctiliously at three-thirty in the afternoon the bugle blew once more, and the Moslem officials proceeded around the Armenian quarter to proclaim that the massacres were over . . . the total casualties in the town, including those slaughtered in the cathedral, amounted to eight thousand dead.

Similar accounts of massive Armenian massacres during this 1894-1896 period abound. In 1909, for similar reasons, the government set another prelude to the 1915-1923 genocide. Then, it ordered and carried out massacres in Adana which killed 30,000 Armenians.

Today, as I have noted, the Turkish government is engaged in an all out effort to deny the Armenian genocide. In addition to its efforts in the United States, it is eradicating the physical evidence of any Armenian existence in Turkey. At the beginning of this century Armenians had two thousand churches in Turkey. Now, under two hundred are standing. As for the rest, the government has: destroyed them; converted them to mosques, warehouses, cinemas, and other uses; or allowed them to be plundered and destroyed. In Armenian schools, Armenians are forbidden to teach history and geography, those subjects can only be taught by Turkish officials. As a final example, Turkey strictly forbids open discussion of Armenian history or any other matters which do not comply with government policy. In March of this year, the Independent Magazine reported that:

In early December 1986 Hilda Hulya Potuoglu was arrested by the Turkish Security Police and charged with making propaganda with intent to destroy or weaken national feelings. The prosecutor of the Istanbul State Security deemed her offense as meriting severe punishment and asked for between a seven-and-a-half and a 15-year jail sentence.

Potuoglu's crime was to edit the Turkish edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica. In this was included a footnote which read as follows: During the Crusades the mountainous regions of Cilicia were under the hegemony of the Armenian Cilician kingdom. . . .

The Encyclopedia Britannica was not the first publication to offend. In 1981 the authorities seized Ankara 50, a guidebook to Ankara produced by the British Institute of Archaeology. The book, when published in 1973, had been passed by the military censor. By 1981, however, times had changed. It was noticed that the book featured a map naming the Roman provinces of Asia Minor including—with perfect historical accuracy—the province of Armenia. The guidebook quickly joined the index of forbidden books along with other such politically dubious publications, The Times Atlas of World History and the National Geographic Atlas of the World.

This is the type of action that the Turkish government and those in the United States who deny the Armenian genocide are promoting—the sacrifice of truth and integrity on the altar of perceived political expedience. This is why I am especially glad to have had this time with you today, to publicly expose exactly what we are all up against in fighting denial of the Armenian genocide. Thank you.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the debate has now begun. On Thursday, at some time mutually agreeable to myself, Senator BYRD, and Senator MITCHELL, we will have a cloture vote. We will decide whether we are going to get to the resolution itself. Right now we are only on the motion to proceed to the resolution.

The Senate can vote with Goliath and all its lobbyists and all its muscle and all its influence. Or it can vote with David, and with the truth. I know we can expect intense, but high-level debate, because I know the participants on both sides of this issue. And, in my view, if we stick to the facts, if we go back and look at the records—we cannot look at some of the records because the Turks will not make them available. They keep saying, oh, everything is open. But let someone try to find them. They are not available.

But, it seems to me, this is something that ought to take a little time in the U.S. Senate. I have not read the story, but I heard about a story that appeared in the Washington Post just this weekend, how this place is becoming sort of immaterial—Congress. We do not debate any issues anymore. We shrink from all the hard issues. I am just speaking generally now.

When we have a hard question, we appoint a commission. Maybe it is Social Security. Maybe it is on the pay raise. Maybe it is on what do we do in Central America. So we have the Scowcroft Commission or we have the Social Security Commission of 1983 or we have the Quadrennial Commission to set our pay—because we do not want to make those difficult choices.

It would seem to me this is an appropriate time for the U.S. Senate to underscore the importance of this institution and to indicate that we are prepared to take a look back, 75 years. And, yes, let history be the judge.

I must say in all fairness, that is the best argument we have, because we cannot win the lobbying war. There is nobody in Armenia that has any money to send over here for lobbyists. There is nobody in that government who can call anybody in Missouri or some other State to say, oh, oh, you better get your Senators. If they vote for this, you may lose a contract. And, as far as I know, there are no big time lobbyists from Armenia out here in the cloakroom, waiting for somebody to come out.

I might add, a couple of those were all for the convention when we ratified the Genocide Convention. They were urging me to move ahead. Genocide is genocide, whether it happens, whoever it may happen to, whatever race.

Having said that, let me just add one other thing—I am advised by my good friend from West Virginia that there is not any compromise possible. But in an effort to reach some compromise, I have been working with the administration. It is not easy for the President of the United States to oppose the pending resolution, but he does.

They are opposed to the resolution in its present form. They have said so and, as I have indicated in my statement, they have said so not only in writing, but they have also said so by State Department calls to Senators and by Defense Department calls to Senators in an effort to kill this resolution before it ever got out of committee.

I have discussed this with Chief of Staff John Sununu and General Scowcroft. We have had a number of meetings. I was in California recently and met with Carl Samuelsan, who is a very close friend of Governor Deukmejian, and we had a conference call with Governor Deukmejian and Congressman PASHAYAN to try to find some language that would recognize the tragedy without being "offensive" to anyone. It is hard to do.

It is hard to do, but I am prepared to say now that if we have a chance to proceed to this resolution that I am prepared to offer language different than I have just read a few moments ago. Let me read for the record what that language would be—the operative language, so it will be clear:

That April 24, 1990, is designated as Armenian Martyrs Day, commemorating the 75th anniversary of the systematic destruction of the Armenian people in the period from 1915 to 1923.

Congress calls on the people of the United States to join the millions of Armenians and other people around the world who commemorate every April 24 as the anniversary of the Armenian genocide, a day of remembrance of the 1½ million Armenian people who were the victims of the government of the Ottoman empire of that period prior to the establishment of the Republic of Turkey.

That is essentially what it would be. What it says, and let me underscore so people understand, it calls upon the people of the United States to join the millions of Armenians and other people around the world who commemorate every April 24 as the anniversary of the Armenian genocide; as opposed to the language that I previously read—in other words, in resolution 1 there is an effect of finding of genocide, and the resolution I am proposing be offered as a substitute at the appropriate time, perhaps with a couple of minor changes, it would indicate we join those who commemorate April 24 as the anniversary of the Armenian genocide. This is a rather substantial difference.

I hope those who oppose the present resolution would have an opportunity to read this new language carefully. It has been drafted as a concurrent resolution. I am advised that I cannot amend a joint resolution with a concurrent resolution, but that I can amend the joint resolution, I can offer a substitute, I have been advised by the Parliamentarian.

So, Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader for making it possible to debate this issue. April 24 is not far away. If we are to succeed, we need to do it as quickly as we can, to send the resolution on to the House. I believe we will succeed. I would hope that we will present the facts in a way that will not offend anyone; that we will be able to present facts. We will have a series of charts tomorrow that ought to spell it out fairly clearly.

Our purpose is not to offend anyone on either side, regardless of how strongly they may feel, but it seems to me that if we will argue, as the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. SIMON] did in the committee, if we will make the case based on history and based on the facts—and he has a lot of evidence that he will be discussing—then we will make the right judgment.

I also want to thank my friend from Michigan, Senator LEVIN, who has been very helpful in this effort. I hope the three of us and others can persuade our colleagues that it is time we let history be judged. We have waited long enough.

Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes Senator BYRD.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have reluctantly opposed the request to proceed to the consideration of the resolution. I say that I have reluctantly opposed the request to proceed because I believe that Senator DOLE's resolution is motivated by good intentions.

I am sorry to be put in this position by my own conscience and my own faith in what I believe to be the facts. I am sorry to be put in the position of opposing the resolution. I am sorry to be put in the position of opposing my friend, Mr. DOLE, in this matter. As I have assured him, and I assure him again, there is nothing personal about my opposition to this resolution, about my opposition to his position. There is also nothing partisan.

I know that the distinguished Republican leader believes every word that he says. I know that he feels strongly about the resolution. The personal emotions that he has to have, I, too, would have if I had walked the same path as Senator DOLE walked during World War II.

I can understand his deeply held feelings. He has deep convictions about the matter. So I do not come to the floor with that kind of attachment—which is a very personal one with Senator DOLE—to the cause that I support. I come with equal convictions, however, that this resolution should not be adopted.

The Republican leader has referred to lobbyists.

I have talked with the Turkish Ambassador, but I invited him to come to see me. I talked with President Ozal 2 or 3 weeks ago when he was in Washington, and I asked him if there was any way that we could change the language of this resolution that would make it acceptable to Turkey. I would have been willing to have changed the language. But he indicated very strongly that all political parties in Turkey are united and that they would be opposed to any change; they would be opposed to this resolution; they would be opposed to any effort to water it down, because it would still be offensive to them.

The distinguished Republican leader talked about the administration's making calls and lobbying. The administration has not called me. I called the administration. I called the President. I called Secretary Baker. I called Assistant Secretary Eagleburger. I called General Scowcroft. Some of these parties I have called more than once. I have called them. They have not called me. They have not lobbied me. I have lobbied them. My problem is, I have not been able to get the administration to come out in the open and say where it stands. That is what it ought to do. It should come out in the open and say where it stands.

As to lobbyists, I do not know any Turkish lobbyists. I do not ask any individual what his history is, national origin is, or anything like that. If there are a dozen Turkish constituents in West Virginia, I cannot name one of them. So I have no Turkish constituents. Perhaps that is where the Turks have made a mistake. If there were a larger Turkish constituency, the vote might be different on the outcome of this debate. We do not have many Turkish immigrants in this country, and perhaps we should have more.

I have explained my contacts with the Turkish Ambassador, my contacts with President Ozal, my contacts with the President, with the Secretary of State, with the Assistant Secretary of State, and the President's security adviser.

This resolution condemns tragic antidemocratic events occurring early in this century, a previous era, not part of the political heritage of the present Government of Turkey. There is a new generation in Turkey. There is a new Government in Turkey.

My good friend, the distinguished Republican leader, said that there were no companies in Soviet Armenia. Turkey is a democracy. Soviet Armenia is not. United States companies can do business with Turkey. It is a democracy.

And so what happened—and some terrible things did undoubtedly happen—was not a part of the heritage of the present Government of Turkey, not part of the personal experience of the present leaders of that Government, not part of the personal experience of the bulk of Turkey's population. I had hoped that the Senate would not come to this point of even debating whether to proceed to consider this resolution because this well-meaning commentary—this resolution, as far as Senator DOLE is concerned and those Senators who have cosponsored it, is well intentioned—this commentary on a piece of Turkish history that occurred seven decades ago has a good chance of producing some pernicious results.

My friend has said that history should make a judgment. Mr. President, historians should make the judgment, historians and scholars, and not politicians on the floor of the Senate, as to what happened or did not happen. Historians will not be lobbied by either side. There apparently is a pretty influential constituency on the Armenian side in this country. That may be why the administration does not come out in the open and say where it stands, Mr. President.

I do not believe that the floor of the the Senate is the appropriate place to make a determination about a matter that ought to be researched, evaluated, and decided by historians and by scholars. I hope that this issue could be left to historians to decide.

I do not want anyone to misunderstand my opposition to the motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution. I have not read the records, but I have reason to believe, and so would acknowledge, that during the time period covered by the resolution some terrible things happened. Atrocities took place. Hundreds of thousands of Armenians were killed in Turkey. I suppose that Turkey lost some people as well. I am deeply sympathetic to the suffering endured by the Armenians during this time period. But I do not know whether what happened to the Armenians constitutes a genocide. That term is a serious label that has been strictly defined in the Genocide Convention for which the implementing legislation was passed while I was the majority leader. The Republican leader was the majority leader in 1986 when the Genocide Convention was approved. The implementing legislation, however, was passed in 1988 when I was majority leader. So we both take pride. I was a supporter of the effort by Mr. DOLE when he was majority leader and he was a supporter of the effort when I was majority leader.

To term a series of events that happened three-quarters of a century ago as genocide is something that should not be done without great care. Labeling a series of events a genocide is not something the Senate should undertake without serious study, deliberation, and careful examination of the evidence. I believe that until that kind of careful examination of all pertinent documents has been done by trained historians, the Senate should not address this issue.

I believe that the situation has been altered significantly in the last year. My friend, the Republican leader, said that he will have documents which he will make available, that other Senators will make available, but that the Turks will not make the records available.

But in the last year the Government of the Republic of Turkey has opened the Ottoman Archives spanning the World War I era. Prior to the new law, all archival materials dated after May 1914 were closed to scholars. Today, all cataloged materials dating through 1939 are open and available.

On June 23, 1989, the Council of Ministers of the Republic of Turkey signed into law new regulations affecting the Turkish State Archives. This law greatly simplifies the procedures by which foreign and Turkish scholars obtain permission to conduct research in the State Archives. Whereas it used to take an average of 6 to 10 months to gain permission to conduct research in the archives, I am advised now a scholar can apply for permission and quickly begin work.

Among the categories of cataloged documents now available are the records of the deliberations and decisions of the Ottoman Council of Ministers, which comprise 224 bound and cataloged volumes covering the years 1885 to 1922. Now, for the first time, all the deliberations and actions of the Council of Ministers for the period of the First World War are available to scholars. This obviously includes all decisions relating to the relocation of the Ottoman Armenians during the war.

In addition, a large number of registers specifically devoted to the non-Muslim peoples of the Ottoman Empire, the so-called church registers and registers concerning the non-Muslim peoples are also open and available to researchers. As well, dozens of other classifications in the Prime Minister's Archives, containing thousands of documents with relevance to the Armenian population during the First World War, were automatically openend to scholars in conjunction with the new law.

I think it is important to note here that since the new regulations went into effect, no scholar who has applied for permission to work on the newly opened records has been denied. That is the advice that I have had.

So there is new information freely available which could help historians make a determination about this matter. But I understand that the issue at hand is not whether historians have or should make a determination about this matter, but whether the Senate should. I believe the scales upon which we shall weigh that determination are tipped by the strategic importance of one of the America's most valuable allies—Turkey.

There are those who say we ought to do what is right. I believe in doing what is right also, Mr. President, I do not think it is right to make a snap judgment, to make a political judgment of something of this kind. In the first place, not one of us, not one of 100 Senators, is really in a position to know the facts. I am not. And I think that this is too serious a question to be resolved by people who do not know the facts, including myself.

I am deeply concerned that if the Senate were to pass it will unwittingly slap the face of a very important NATO ally. Turky's role in NATO is the key to preventing the Soviet Union's Black Sea fleet from transiting the Bosphorus into the Mediterranean. Turkey also has the longest border of any NATO country with the Soviet Union, a 300-mile land border and a 900-mile sea border. This totals roughly 33 percent of the NATO frontier with the Warsaw Pact countries. Turkey's armed forces, which total roughly 650,000, are the largest European NATO force. The army is larger than the ground forces of West Germany, and greater than the British, Greek, Canadian, Dutch, Danish, and Portuguese forces combined.

I am concerned that if the Senate were to adopt this resolution, we could jeopardize the upcoming round of base rights negotiations.

My friend, Mr. DOLE, has indicated that the Turks have made threats in the past and nothing happened. He also, of course, indicated that something might really happen in this instance. I have not heard of any threats, but the passage of the resolution could result in further limitations on United States access to important Turkish military facilities, including key facilities used to monitor Soviet troop movements and arms control agreements. As my friend, Mr. DOLE, referred to NATO, we do not know how long NATO will be around. But the arms control agreements will be around. Whether NATO is around or not, there are arms control agreements that will be around and they are in our own security interests and in the security interests of NATO and other countries of the free world. They will need to be monitored.

On March 17, 1987, the United States and Turkey signed two Side Letters to a new Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement, called the DECA Agreement. The previous DECA was renewed in 1980; the 1987 Side Letters extended the DECA until December 18, 1990. We must negotiate a new agreement this year.

Unlike in some other countries, the United States does not have its own bases in Turkey, except for the United States Logistics Group headquarters [TUSLOG] in Ankara. Instead, the United States has access to a variety of Turkish and NATO military installations.

The most important facilities are covered by the Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement. These include a major air base in Incirlik in southern Turkey, three major monitoring facilities at Sinop on the Black Sea, at Pirinclik near Diyarbakir in eastern Turkey, and at Belbasi outside Ankara, and a naval fuel depot—providing fuel and ammunition storage for the 6th Fleet—at Izkenderun in southern Turkey near Adana. Also covered by the DECA is a Coast Guard long-range aid to navigation [LORAN C] radio navigation site at Kargaburun.

The United States also has other facilities in Turkey not covered by the DECA, including several Army and Air Force installations to store nuclear weapons. The United States also is establishing collocated operating bases to pre-position wartime materials. The Joint United States Military Mission for Aid to Turkey [JUSMMAT], which coordinates United States military assistance to Turkey, is located in Ankara, and is attached to the Turkish General Staff. In addition, the United States has access to a variety of NATO facilities, including the Eastern Mediterranean headquarters at Izmir for Land Forces, Southeast, and for the 6th Allied Tactical Air Force. Near Izmir, there is also a Turkish air base at Cigli, which provides support for United States personnel assigned to NATO.

The last time the Armenian resolution was an issue, in 1987, Turkey refused to ratify the DECA Side Letters and canceled a trip to the United States by then-President Evren. It took nearly a year to repair the damage caused by mere introduction of that resolution to get the relationship back on track and to gain ratification of the two Side Letters. Then last October, Turkey restricted United States access to military facilities in Turkey in response to the Judiciary Committee's reporting of the resolution. Concerns about what might happen if this resolution were to be approved by the Senate should not be dismissed as idle threats. Turkey has demonstrated that it cares deeply about this matter and that it has and will act in response to action taken on the resolution.

It is a very innocuous resolution on its face. As far as I am concerned, I suppose I would have no problem with the resolution, because I see it through different eyes than do the Turks. But to them it is indeed a serious matter. I am not offened by the language, but to them the language is offensive. That is what we have to pay attention to. How will they react?

This resolution is not intended as a slap at Turkey, but its passage may have serious repercussions in Turkey and serious ramifications for United States-Turkey relations and for NATO. Do we really want to jeopardize all this by adopting this resolution? Do we really want to risk losing our access to bases on NATO's southern flank? Do we really want to impair our ability to monitor Soviet troop movements? Do we really want to impede our ability to verify arms control agreements? I certainly do not—and I do not think any Member of this Chamber would want to do so either. I do not believe that those who are cosponsoring the resolution believe that will happen. Unfortunately, that is exactly what could happen if the Senate approved this resolution.

I know that one could say that Turkey has interests, as well, and they will not do this or that because they have their own interests at stake. Well, it is a chancy business.

This resolution may appear on the surface to be a simple commemorative resolution. But it is not. This resolution raises many thorny defense and foreign policy issues. It is not simple, it is not straightforward. It is intensely controversial, and I believe, not a matter on which this body ought to be taking a stance, certainly not without extensive examination, hearings, debate, and considered analysis of all available evidence. That has not yet taken place. There have been no committee hearings on this issue.

What is at stake here is a matter of labeling a country—modern Turkey—guilty of the crime of genocide. Genocide is not just a label, it is a determination of criminal action, a criminal action for which there is criminal liability. Why are we doing that? What useful purpose can this resolution serve at this late date? Any country against which the allegation of genocide has been lodged, ought in all fairness, to be accorded the right to a factual investigation into all allegations before such a determination is made. After all, how long did the Senate spend investigating the matter of the impeachment of Judge Claiborne, Judge Hastings, and Judge Nixon? Those investigations consumed months and months and months of the Senate's time in hearings, testimony, investigations, to say nothing of the time spent on the Senate floor in the trials themselves. Yet with no more than a half hour of debate in the Judiciary Committee, with not a single hearing, with not one whit of investigation—factual investigation—the Senate is prepared to consider determining whether Turkey is guilty of the crime of genocide 60 to 75 years ago.

Do we really want to put ourselves in that position?

I am deeply concerned about the potential impact that an approval of this resolution could have on the troubling instability and ethnic conflict in the Caucasus and Balkan regions. The recent turmoil in Azerbaijan, which forced Mr. Gorbachev to send in troops to bring order back to the area, is deeply disturbing. It is clear that Mr. Gorbachev's laudable perestroika and glasnost policies have shaken the Soviet Union to its very foundations. As people have become more free to speak their minds, they have also become more free to vent their animosities against other ethnic groups.

They have not been satisfied merely to speak their minds, they have erupted into violence—ethnic group against ethnic group—rent asunder, and no longer held together by an inviolate Communist Party. Even their mutual dislike for their Russian and Communist overlords has been insufficient to prevent the outbreak of serious ethnic violence. Just last week, that same kind of violence broke out in a new area of the Soviet Union—Muslims against Christians in the Central Asian Republic of Tajikistan. Then late last week, rioting between Muslims and Armenians broke out in yet another Soviet Republic—this time Uzbekistan.

In the Balkans, a review of what has happened in Bulgaria is instructive about the depth of ethnic animosities. In Bulgaria, the Communist leadership for many years had pursued a policy of forced assimilation of its ethnic Turkish minority. The Bulgarian Government forced its Turkish citizens to change their Turkish names to Bulgarian ones. It killed, wounded, and arrested hundreds of ethnic Turks who protested this new policy. Using both force and coercion, the Bulgarian Government removed ethnic Turks from their own villages and resettled them into areas with small Turkish populations.

The Government also prohibited the study of the Turkish language in schools. It banned the use of the Turkish language in public. It made the receipt and reading of Turkish publications a punishable act. It jammed the reception of Trukish radio and television programs. It severely curtailed the right of its own Turkish citizens to practice their religion and closed mosques and barred the importation of copies of the Koran.

None of these acts was enough. Last year, the Bulgarian Government, which previously had prevented its Turkish citizens from emigrating, reversed course, and expelled them across the border into Turkey. Not just a few—hundreds of thousands of them.

My point here is not to relate the sad tale of what the ethnic Turkish Bulgarians have suffered, but to demonstrate that when the Bulgarian Communists were overthrown and the new Government repudiated all the abhorrent policies against the ethnic Turks, the Bulgarian people turned out in massive demonstrations against the new Government. The people, it seems, supported those abhorrent policies against the ethnic Turks. The people thought it was just fine to assimilate forcibly a despised ethnic minority and when that was not enough, thought it was great to expel them.

This indeed, is a sad commentary on the inability of different peoples to live together in harmony. And it is not just in Bulgaria where ethnic groups are having trouble living together—it is happening in Yugoslavia, where Serbs and Croatians cannot live together in peace, where Serbs and Albanians are fighting each other. In Rumania, ethnic Rumanians cannot seem to live in peace with their ethnic Hungarian minority. This resolution asks Senators to vote on controversial historical events over which the Turkish Government today and a new generation there have no control, just as we today have no control over what happened then.

This resolution asks the U.S. Senate to endorse a particular view of these events and to take sides in a historical debate. The effect of our judgment could well be to damage the stability of democracy in Turkey and to damage United States relations with Turkey. Our actions on the Senate floor could fan the flames of the politics of yesteryear in the tinderbox known as the Balkans and in the Caucasus at a singularly inappropriate time when old ethnic passions have ignited.

The Balkan region is fraught with ethnic tensions—just as the Caucasus is fraught with ethnic tension. Senate approval of this resolution would only fan the flames.

Why do we want to take a chance on doing that? Why do that? Why take that chance?

What possible good can this resolution do?

It can do harm.

It can fan the flames and provide further fuel for people who cannot live together in harmony, for people who resort to violence in their disputes with their neighbors.

Senate approval of this resolution would offend a trusted and loyal ally—an ally that fought with us in the Korean war, an ally that protects NATO's southern flank, an ally that provides access to a variety of important military facilities, an ally that alone can block the exit of Soviet ships from the Black Sea.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that a determination by the Senate of this matter is appropriate.

It should not be 100 Senators who without a hearing, without an investigation, without determining the facts, without looking at the records firsthand, without going to the archives, make a judgment of this kind.

I have a very fond feeling for the Republican leader. He knows of my affection for him as an individual. I admire him as a patriotic American who answered his country's call and paid a price. I recognize his sincerity in this matter. I want to do nothing that would impair our relationship, nothing.

He has a duty to speak what he believes; I have a duty to try to do what I can to prevent what I see as something which could impair the alliance between the United States and Turkey, could impair that fledgling democracy, and could spill over into the already boiling kettle in the Caucasus and in the Balkans.

I have already said that what happened to the Armenians was tragic and was terrible. I am in deep sympathy with what generations of Armenians have experienced as a result of tragic and brutal events. I do not have any close friends who are Turks. I cannot even say I have one friend who is a Turk. Undoubtedly, there must be a few Turkish Americans over the hill country of West Virginia. My favorite doctor is an Armenian. My wife's favorite doctor is an Armenian doctor. He is a patriotic, loyal, dedicated American. So, I do not like to be put in the position I am in, but I do not believe that this resolution is in the best interests of the United States.

And again I say that I do not speak in derogation of the authors of the resolution. They believe just as firmly that the resolution is appropriate and necessary as I do that it is not. I do not believe that the Senate can or should attempt to make a determination on whether what happened constitutes a genocide.

The U.S. Senate should not become the vehicle for reopening old wounds and igniting smoldering hatreds. No Member of the Senate body wants that.

Mr. President, I join with the distinguished Republican leader who has made reference to the terrible happenings that have recently fallen upon Soviet Armenia, the earthquake and the victims of that tragedy.

I will support as quickly as will any other Senator any effort to bring relief to suffering peoples anywhere. But this resolution does not do that. It has nothing to do with the Armenian earthquake. It has nothing to do with the lives that were lost there. It is well intentioned, but I hope that the Senate will not proceed to the consideration of the resolution. This is not the time, this is not the place, and these are not the circumstances that make consideration of the resolution itself a necessity.

It is difficult, Mr. President, to argue against the resoluton. This is a country that is noted for its Constitution and the constitutional guarantees concerning human rights, but there is a greater document than the Constitution and that document is the Book that my mother read. And in that Holy Bible we are told—and I shall paraphrase—that "He that putteth his hand to the plow and looketh back is not fit for the Kingdom of God."

What I am saying is we should not put our hand to the plow here and look back into the dim past. We could be doing a people a wrong and we can as well be participating in something here that could bring more suffering on peoples in that old Middle Eastern region and in the southeastern part of the Soviet Union.

I can understand how today's generation of Turks do not want to see the label of genocide applied to their grandparents concerning events which occurred at a time when Ataturk was a commander in the Turkish military.

The Turks are to be greatly admired. They do not ask for much. We do not give them much. I have already indicated the strength of the Turkish forces that are the resources of NATO. They have been fighting the people of the North for centuries. Turkey is a valuable ally and its position is important to Israel and to other countries in the Middle East. Turkey borders on Iran and Iraq, Syria, and the Soviet Union. I hope we will consider all of these things carefully as we come to vote on cloture the day after tomorrow.

Again I say to my friend, the Republican leader, I respect him. He is fighting for what he believes in. He is conscientious. He is dedicated. I wish the administration were just as dedicated and conscientious and outgoing and right out on top of the table as is the distinguished Republican leader.

The Republican leader decries lobbyists. I join him in that, to a certain extent. I also decry political commitments that are made in the heat of campaigns that are not in the best interests of the United States. And what is to be more regretted is that when one begins to see the world as it really is after the campaign is over, and is bound to see that a campaign commitment was wrong, a mistake, he does not face facts as they are in the real world and simply say, "What I thought in the campaign was what I thought in the campaign, but now I no longer see through a glass darkly. It is a mistake to proceed in this way. I cannot continue to honor a wrong commitment.

Perhaps, may I say to the distinguished Republican leader, if there could ever be campaign financing reform legislation, meaningful legislation, some of us would not get into these situations in campaigns, where Senators go around the country and people in the administration go around the country and hold out their hats and tin cups and beg for contributions and make campaign promises that are not in the best interests of the country.

The Senator from Michigan has been very patient and I thank him for waiting. I will certainly apologize for speaking at length but I am going to listen to what he has to say.

I am sorry that he is on the other side of the matter. I hope that others will come to speak. I do not like to carry all the burden myself but I am capable of speaking at considerable length when I believe in something as I do this. I may speak slowly, but that allows me to speak longer. And sometimes it is important to speak slowly and think before one speaks.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAHAM). The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I listened with great interest to my friend from West Virginia, as I did to the Republican leader. They spoke, both of them, with their usual eloquence and integrity. The President pro tempore and I are, indeed, on different sides on this issue. I, too, regret that. But that happens at times and his beliefs are held with great sincerity, as are those of the Senator from Kansas and myself and the Senator from Illinois. I think we all understand how those differences do arise from time to time in this body.

Mr. President, I will be brief, given the hour. I have cosponsored, and indeed support, the resolution to designate April 24 as a National Day of Remembrance of the 75th Anniversary of the Armenian Genocide.

There is an overwhelming body of historical documentation and eyewitness accounts that prove that the appalling events of the Armenian genocide occurred during the time of the Ottoman Empire, in which as many as 1.5 million Armenians died during the years 1915 to 1923. The resolution emphasizes, as we all must, that the events in question occurred prior to the establishment of the Republic of Turkey. This resolution does not reach any judgment on the Government of Turkey, on the current Republic of Turkey. The events at issue from 1915 to 1923 occurred during the Ottoman Empire.

Again, according to the words of the resolution, "prior to the establishment" of the modern Republic of Turkey.

The Republic of Turkey is, indeed, a valued and important friend of the United States. However, our important mutual security interests with our NATO ally and our close friendship with and respect for the Turkish poeple are not reasons to rewrite history or to ignore history. To deny this history is to deny the terrible loss of innocent lives and to ignore the assistance which was extended by the United States to Armenia at that time.

Mr. President, we must never forget. If we do forget I am afraid, as some have said, we are going to be doomed to repeat history. That is the reason why we acknowledge events, acknowledge tragedies. So that we can attempt in some small way to avoid the repetition of those tragedies.

There was a widespread, systematic massacre of Armenians between the years 1915 and 1923.

In Aprils past, survivors of Armenian genocide have traveled to Washington for commemoration and to pay tribute to the memory of the victims who perished. I have spoken with surviviors. I have seen their faces. And I have heard what I believe, and most historians believe, is the truth.

There are many, many painful, contemporaneous eyewitness accounts that document the horrors. Accounts of the systematic slaughter were reported by not just survivors but journalists, government officials, and missionaries and travelers from many nations. There was a systematic intentional effort to eliminate Armenians as a people.

The American Ambassador to the Ottoman Empire, Henry Morgenthau, telegraphed the following to the United States Secretary of State on July 16, 1915. The Ambassador telegraphed the following message:

> Deportation of an excesses against peaceful Armenians is increasing and from harrowing reports of eyewitnesses it appears that a campaign of race extermination is in progress under pretext of reprisal against rebellion.

Ambassador Morgenthau wrote a book which a number of us have read and many of us have. One of the paragraphs in that book is as follows:

> When the Turkish authorities gave the orders for these deportations, they were merely giving the death warrant to a whole race; they understood this well and in their conversations with me, they made no particular attempt to conceal the fact.
> I am confident that the whole history of the human race contains no such horrible episode as this. The great massacres and persecutions of the past seem almost insignificant when compared to the sufferings of the Armenian race in 1915.

That was in the book of the American Ambassador to the Ottoman Empire.

Mr. President, he wrote about events that occurred in the years 1915 to 1923. At that time he may have been accurate in his characterization that in the whole history of the human race, mankind had not seen such horror. But as we know, genocidal horror revisited mankind after Ambassador Morgenthau wrote. Mankind did not learn, did not comprehend, did not recoil in unified horror. And I believe that, at least in part, because mankind did not respond to the genocide of the Armenians in the years 1915 to 1923, genocide reoccurred.

Elie Wiesel, a commanding presence with the moral authority of history, stated in this building, in our rotunda, in April of 1981 the following:

Before the planning of the final solution, had Hitler asked who remembers the Armenians?

Elie Wiesel went on to say:

He was right. Nobody remembered them as no one remembered the Jews. Rejected by everyone, they felt expelled from history.

It has been said, and said accurately, that at the time of the First World War, many, many thousands of Turks and many, many thousands of others also died. They did. It is important to respect history and it is important to remember. We should remember and honor the innocent victims of all sides that fell to the cruelties of the great war, both those who died as the result of the violent turmoil of battle, and those who perished because of starvation, disease, and deprivation.

We should acknowledge the suffering of innocent Turks, and innocent people of whatever nationality or religion who died during this time. But, Mr. President, that is not the point.

It is our intention and the intention of this resolution to honor the memory of, so that mankind will not forget, the Armenians who were massacred by the Ottoman Empire. Massacred because, and only because, they were Armenian.

In an interview published in the Los Angeles Examiner on August 1, 1926, Ataturk himself acknowledged the crimes of the earlier government. He called the former government murderers, and vowed that they would not overthrow the Republic of Turkey, in the words of Ataturk, that earlier government "should have been made to account for the lives of millions of our subjects who were ruthlessly driven, en masse, from their homes and massacred. * * *"

There is much more from other authorities, from Ambassador Morgenthau and others, that could and will be made part of the RECORD, which document specific incidents and horrors.

We have Lord Bryce, in the House of Lords in London in October 1915, reporting to the House of Lords about the atrocities. That horrible policy, Lord Bryce said, has been carried out thoroughly by the present Turkish Government, the policy being a policy of the extermination of the Armenian people. Lord Bryce said that on behalf of these pathetic survivors of a fine race that other nations, including America, should come to their aid. According to the New York Times of October 7, Lord Bryce appealed to the conscience of neutrals. What he believed, he said, is there are some crimes even now in the convulsion of a great world war that the public opinion of the world will not tolerate. The House of Lords responded.

The Senate of the United States in May 1920 adopted a resolution referring to testimony at hearings of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations "Clearly establishing the truth of the reported massacres and other atrocities from which the Armenian people have suffered." That was Senate Resolution 359, May 11, 1920.

Arnold Toynbee, the League of Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and others have given us both eyewitness and historical reports of the Armenian genocide in 1915 to 1923. It is appropriate that we remember that genocide. If it had been remembered earlier in this country, I believe other genocides may have been avoided. That is the reason for remembering and that is the reason for not forgetting these events. If we ignore history, it is more likely that that history will be repeated.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. SIMON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I rise in support of this resolution. I want to particularly pay tribute to my colleague, Senator DOLE, for standing up on this. There are not very many Armenians in Kansas, and to the credit of the minority leader and his wife, they visited Soviet Armenia right after the earthquake there. I appreciate his persistence on this in the face of considerable opposition.

I regret I had to be away from the floor when the President pro tempore spoke. I have, as he knows, a very high regard for him. While I differ with him on this particular resolution, I wanted to hear what he had to say, and I will read it in the RECORD tomorrow. I know we say these things very easily, "we will read them in the RECORD," but I will read it in the RECORD.

There is one other general observation that goes beyond this resolution, Mr. President, and that is the need for communication between religious groups. What you have here with the Armenians and, in this case, the Turks—and in Azerbaijan you have the same problem—what you have with the Jewish community and Moslems, you have had groups because of their heritage finding themselves in conflict. We need greater communication between religious groups, whether it is Christian, Moslem, Moslem-Jewish, Northern Ireland, Catholic, Protestants, whatever. The last reason we ought to be killing each other is in the name of religion, and yet that, unfortunately, has taken place.

One of the things I have observed, Mr. President, is that there is no comprehensive study on this whole problem. I was able to get ahold of a book, "A Historical Survey of the Armenian Case," written by Kersam Aharonian. I am not sure I am pronouncing that name correctly. But we have sufficient evidence we know that a massacre took place. It is one of the tragedies of history. It is not simply the documented evidence—I talked just this past week with an old gentleman who relayed to me what had happened to his family when he was 10 years old—a brutal experience that will be part of his memory the rest of his life.

What we are talking about is not a criticism of the Government of Turkey today, and I would like to make that abundantly clear. What we are talking about is a recognition of a slaughter that took place some decades ago, but we should not pretend that it did not take place.

Frankly, my colleagues who say we do not want to offend Turkey, therefore, we should not do this—I understand that though I disagree with that particular argument. Those who say we are not sure whether genocide occurred, that I do not understand when the evidence is just so overwhelming that it has occurred. The question is not whether genocide has occurred, whether this massacre occurred; the question is, Do we remember it? Do we learn from it? And my hope, obviously, is that we will.

When people say it is not in the United States interest to do this because of the strategic location of Turkey, the fundamental interest of the United States is and always will be human rights. When we fail to stand up for human rights as we should, then we are not acting in the best interest of this country.

For those who say we do not want to revive all these things of the past, if we are on friendly terms with other countries, we ought to have candor, and if the Turkish Parliament wants to adopt a resolution saying that we have in this country over the years mistreated our native Americans, the American Indians, they have a perfect right to do that, and it is a valid criticism. If they want to criticize what we did to the Japanese Americans in 1942, it is a valid criticism of what happened.

I think we ought to follow the example of the European Parliament which adopted a resolution similar to the one that we are being asked to adopt here.

I have to say I thought this was originally going to be one of these things that passed without any problems at all, but all of a sudden after it was introduced, we ended up with—I have had leaders of major defense industries contact me, high officials in the administration. It has escalated beyond anything I anticipated. But the fundamental question is should we do anything?

I would like to quote from a Presidential candidate by the name of George Bush. He said:

The United States must acknowledge the attempted genocide of the Armenian people in the last years of the Ottoman Empire based on the testimony of survivors, scholars, and indeed our own representatives at the time, if we are to ensure that such horrors are not repeated. The American people, our Government, and certainly the Bush administration will never allow political pressures to prevent our denunciation of crimes against humanity. I would join Congress in commemorating the victims of that period.

I do not know what happened between that statement and where we are today, but clearly a different signal is coming from the White House today. I hope that there can be a gentle reminder to those in authority what was said during the campaign, and I think we would be wise to live up to that.

Let me just quote from a few American leaders. President Reagan, April 22, 1981:

Like the genocide of the Armenians before it, and the genocide of the Cambodians which followed it, and like too many other such persecutions of too many other peoples, the lessons of the Holocaust must never be forgot.

President Jimmy Carter, May 16, 1978:

It is generally not known in the world that in the years preceding 1916 there was a concerted effort made to eliminate all the Armenian people, probably one of the greatest tragedies that ever befell any group and there weren't any Nuremberg trials.

Herbert Hoover wrote in his memoirs:

The association of Mount Ararat and Noah, the staunch Christians who were massacred periodically by the Mohammedan Turks, and the Sunday School collections over 50 years for alleviating their miseries—all cumulate to impress the name Armenia on the front of the American mind.

Warren G. Harding, 1921:

If it is believed that a warship can be sent to an Armenian port on the Mediterranean I should have very little hesitancy in making such a suggestion on behalf of these stricken people. Surely there must be some way in which to utter the admonition of the five great powers to restrain the hands of assassins in that unfortunate land.

What President Harding said, "Surely there must be some way in which to utter the admonition," is what we are attempting to do. Let us not repeat history is what we are saying.

There are other quotes I could give you from the other Presidents over the years.

Let me repeat one quote that Senator LEVIN gave us from Elie Wiesel, who has been such a leader in behalf of remembering the Holocaust. On April 30, 1981, he said:

Before the planning of the final solution, Hitler asked, "Who remembers the Armenians?" He was right. No one remembered them, as no one remembered the Jews. Rejected by everyone, they felt expelled from history.

And then finally two other quotes, one from some Moslem leaders written to the Gov. Gen. Reshid Pasha in the Province of Kastemuni, or maybe it is a city. I confess I am not sure. Listen to what these Moslem leaders said. This comes from a trial in 1919:

We have learned that the Armenians, men, women and children, of our surrounding provinces, have been led as animals to the slaughter house and have been murdered. We do not want the same thing to take place in our district because we fear divine anger. A government of violence and illegality cannot long endure. We do not want such "crimes" to be committed in our province.

This is a group of Moslem leaders. To their credit, they issued that statement.

Listen to what the Commander of the Turkish 3d Army Gen. Mahmoud Kiamil Pasha said. In a decree he issued he said:

Kiamil decreed: "All Moslems are prohibited from saving a single Armenian. If a Moslem dares do so, he will be hanged in the shadow of his own house, which will be burned down."

That is grim language. That is part of history——

The reason we are doing this and the reason why the remembrance of the Holocaust is so important for the Jews, the reason it is so important that we remember what happened in this country as recently as 1942 when we took 130,000 Japanese Americans away from the west coast with no justification whatsoever. The reason we remember these things is so that we do not repeat them.

I think it is important that we adopt this resolution. I know the Turkish Government feels very strongly about that. I know there are a lot of people in this administration who feel very strongly that we should not do this. This is not a reflection on the current Government of Turkey. It is a recitation of what has happened in history long before modern Turkey. It is a signal from this country to people in Azerbaijan, to people everywhere, we are not going to forget the Armenians, and it is a signal to others of whatever background that we do not want to tolerate the abuse, the slaying, the torture of innocent people. I think, by all means, we should adopt this resolution.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I rise in support of the resolution and hope that this body will do what it should do, which is not just consider it but pass it.

Before I go further, it is only fair to give commendation to those who have earned it, to the primary author of this resolution, Senator DOLE, the distinguished Republican leader, and to those with whom he has worked and whom he properly noted, Congressman CHARLES PASHAYAN of California, himself the proud son of Armenian Americans, the Governor of our State, George Deukmejian, also of Armenian heritage. To these gentlemen, there is not a question because in their personal lives for too many years they have had recounted, from relatives, from friends, the horrors of the time that we seek to commemorate with this resolution. There seems to be two points which cause some of my colleagues to hesitate. Indeed some have removed their names from this resolution earlier because of qualms which they had. One of the points has to do with whether or not this genocide ever occurred, whether or not it took place in the history of 1915; and the second point, of course, which has been addressed by those who support and oppose the resolution, is the propriety of a resolution that might cause a valued and distinguished ally to take umbrage.

Mr. President, let me address both of those points in order. To begin with, there can be no doubt, none whatever, that this tragedy occurred any more than there can be any doubt that the terrible, unforgettable act of inhumanity which marked the Second World War, the Holocaust against Jews perpetrated by Hitler and Nazi Germany, actually took place.

Mr. President, the documentation of this is so extensive it seems to me beyond comprehension that anyone could reasonably doubt it actually occurred.

This volume alone contains some of the records from United States Archives relating to this instance, documentation that this tragedy actually occurred in the dimensions in which it did occur—1½ million people, men, women and children, innocent of any crime slaughtered because by accident of birth they were Armenian in a regime that determined to exterminate them. This evidence, Mr. President, is so overwhelming that it begins even before the event itself took place.

In April 1915, the Ottoman regime issued a proclamation requiring that all Armenians be deported to distant "vilayets" or provinces, most of them within eastern Turkey. The deportation of these Armenian men, women and children began, but instead of simply being an act of deportation, what occurred was merciless slaughter of these innocents, and subsequent memoranda that have been filed with the U.S. Department of State by missionaries, by businessmen, by diplomatic personnel, by educators, now available for review at the United States Archives, indicate that 600,000 Armenians alone died in the deportation carried out between April and December of the first year of that terrible several years of genocide that commenced in 1915. Six hundred thousand taken from their villages for deportation never reached their ultimate destinations.

One of those who documents this fact was the American consul posted to one of the major deportation provinces of eastern Turkey. Leslie A. Davis notes in a number of written reports sent to Washington that were never acknowledged in the public debate on the Armenian genocide until today that Americans living in the region labeled that area as the "slaughterhouse vilayet."

In a December 30, 1915, dispatch to the U.S. Ambassador to the Ottoman empire, the Honorable Henry Morgenthau, Leslie Davis wrote that:

> The term "slaughterhouse vilayet" * * * has been fully justified by what I have learned and actually seen since September. It appears * * * that men, women and children were massacred about 5 hours' distance from here. In fact, it is almost certain that with the exception of a very small number * * * all who have left here have been massacred before reaching the borders of the vilayet.

We have this information because Leslie Davis recorded it in a typewritten manuscript of 132 pages, one that he sent to his superiors upon his return to the United States after 3 years of consular duty during which he witnessed countless numbers of murders and forced deportations.

Susan Blair, a researcher and author, subsequently reproduced the Davis report in her 1989 book entitled "The Slaughterhouse Province."

These, Mr. President, are the consular dispatches that were sent by Leslie Davis in 1915, the 132 pages of typewritten manuscript. Susan Blair, in her book, points out that Leslie Davis offered a unique perspective on Armenian genocide because as a diplomat representing a neutral nation he was able to personally visit massacre sites and was able to see, to quote her, "the bodies of murdered Armenians whom he had previously seen alive."

So we have the personal verification, on his own personal knowledge of the victims, of an American diplomat.

Despite these dramatic occurrences, Mr. Davis is certainly not one who held any brief for the victims. Indeed by his own admission he held little respect for the Armenian people or their culture. So this eyewitness was not one who was sympathetic. He was certainly not a propagandist, certainly not employed to tell this story, at least not by the victims whose tragedy he recorded.

In order, Mr. President, that my colleages may have the opportunity to review the Davis account before we fully dispose of this resolution, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of it appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APPENDIX A—CONSULAR DISPATCHES

(By Leslie A. Davis 1915)

AMERICAN CONSULATE,
MAMOURET-UL-AZIZ (HARPUT),
June 30, 1915.

Hon. HENRY MORGENTHAU,
American Ambassador,
Constantinople.

SIR: I have the honor to report to the Embassy about one of the severest measures ever taken by any government and one of the greatest tragedies in all history. If the Embassy had not already learned about it from other sources, my telegrams of June 27th and 28th and my brief dispatch of June 29th will have brought the matter to the attention of the Embassy.

The attention of the Embassy has been called, in previous dispatches from this Consulate, to the very critical situation here. My dispatches of April 19th, May 5th and June 2nd (file No. 840.1) referred to the general conditions and the fears of the people that a massacre was being planned. I have reported in frequent dispatches the hostile attitude of the local authorities during the last few months toward the American missionaries and the complete interruption of all work in the American schools (File No. 360) In my dispatch of June 12th (File No. 300) I spoke of the actual danger in which the American missionaries in this part of Turkey are now placed and in my cipher dispatch of June 24th (File No. 300/840.1/703) I gave some further details of what has been happening here.

As stated in some of the above mentioned dispatches, a revolutionary movement on the part of some of the Armenians was discovered and severe measures were taken to check it. These were undertaken in a wholesale matter, little distinction being made between people who were entirely innocent and those who were suspected of being participants in the movement. Practically every male Armenian of any consequence at all here has been arrested and put in prison. A great many of them were subjected to the most cruel tortures under which some of them died. Several hundred of the leading Armenians were sent away at night and it seems to be clearly established that most, if not all, of them were killed. Last week there were well founded rumors of a threatened massacre. I think there is very little doubt that one was planned.

Another method was found, however, to destroy the Armenian race. This is no less than the deportation of the entire Armenian population, not only from this Vilayet, but, I understand, from all six Vilayets comprising Armenia. There are said to be about sixty thousand Armenians in this Vilayet and about a million in the six Vilayets. All of these are to be sent into exile; an undertaking greater probably, than anything of the kind in all history. For several days last week there were rumors of this but it seemed incredible.

On Saturday, June 28th, it was publicly announced that all Armenians and Syrians were to leave after five days. The town of Mamouret-ul-Aziz and the city of Harput were divided into districts and notice was given at each house of the day when the occupants must leave. Two days are given for Mamouret-ul-Aziz, July 1st and third. Three days are given for Harput, July 4th, 5th and 6th. In these two towns, supposed to contain a population of about 40,000, there are probably not less than 15,000 or 18,000 Armenians, or at least three thousand families. There are as many more in the neighbouring villages and these are to leave a few days later.

The full meaning of such an order can scarcely be imagined by those who are not familiar with the peculiar conditions of this isolated region. A massacre, however horrible the word may sound, would be humane in comparison with it. In a massacre many escape but a wholesale deportation of this kind in this country means a lingering and perhaps even more dreadful death for nearly every one. I do not believe it possible for one in hundred a survive, perhaps not one in thousand.

The alleged destination of those sent from here is Urfa, but I know very well this does not mean the city of Urfa. It may mean the Mesopotamia plain to the southeast of that city, a region almost uninhabitable for man or beast. Whatever the destination may be, the journey from here in that direction at this season of the year is very difficult for one who has made careful preparations and travels by wagon. It is for the most part over an extremely hot plain in which there is very little water or vegetation. There are places where there is no water at all during an entire day's journey by wagon. A crowd of women and children on foot will, of course, require several days to traverse the same distance. They cannot go from here to Urfa in less than fifteen or twenty days. There are only two towns and two or three small villages on this route. It would be impossible to find in these villages food for more than twenty or thirty people and there will be days and days when neither food nor water can be obtained. People on foot cannot carry enough food and water on their backs to last them between towns. Under the most favorable conditions the journey is a very fatiguing one (I am speaking from experience, as I traversed that route twice last summer on my attempted trip to America and my return to Harpout). For people traveling as these Armenians who are going into exile will be obliged to travel it is certain death for by far the greater part of them.

It must be borne in mind that wagons and horses are practically unavailable. There are probably not more than twenty-five wagons that can be found for the five or six thousand families who are leaving from this immediate locality. There are several hundred ox-carts and quite a good many small donkeys, while some people are planning to take a cow on which to carry a little food and a blanket or two. This represents every available means of transportation in this region at the present time. There are not nearly enough animals of any kind to enable each family to have one and it is obvious that nearly every one will have to travel on foot. A few of the more fortunate families will have an animal or two on which the women and children can take turns riding, but there will be many cases where a mother with a babe in arms and several small children, and no husband, will have no animal at all.

The fate of these people can readily be imagined. The method is perhaps a little more cultured than a massacre but it will be far more effective and thorough. It is quite probable that many of them will be robbed and murdered en route as the roads are now filled with bands of pillaging Kurds. I asked the Vali the other day what measures were being taken for the protection of these people. He replied that there would be plenty of gendarmes with them so as to avoid a repetition of the fate which had befallen the prisoners who had been sent away from here before, and added that they had met some Kurds who had treated them rather unpleasantly. There is little doubt that these Kurds had been engaged to dispose of them. Many think, and it is by no means improbable, that the same fate is being prepared for those who are now leaving. It is quite possible that the men may be killed, the more attractive women carried off as slaves, and the other women and children left to perish in the desert. In any case, it is quite certain that almost all will die in one way or another before they ever reach their destination.

One thing that increases the doubt about their safe arrival anywhere is that quite a good many people who have been deported from Erzurum and Erzincan have been expected here, but with the exception of one small party from the latter place, none have arrived as yet, while there have been many rumors that these parties have been attacked and killed by Kurds. Money has been sent here from different ones but no one of them has ever appeared to claim it.

Another bad omen is that Vali has refused permission for any of the Americans to accompany the parties leaving here. Some of the missionaries decided that they would like to go with them in order to be of assistance to those who might need help. On Sunday, the 27th, I called on the Vali about this and other matters. This request he refused absolutely saying it could not be granted but that after the people reached their destination the Americans might then join them if they wished. As probably very few, if any, of them will ever reach their destination this was a safe offer. If it were intended to give these people a safe-conduct to any place there would probably be no objection to the Americans accompanying them. On the other hand, as the roads are decidedly unsafe now, it may be that the Vali did not want to take the responsibility of allowing the Americans to risk their lives in this way. Or, perhaps, the Vali's suggestion that the Americans might join these people later was an intimation that the missionaries also may be invited to leave in the near future.

In my telegrams of June 27th and 28th and in a telegram from Mr. Riggs to Mr. Peet on the 28th we spoke of the need for relief at the destination and I suggested asking aid from America. To what extent it may be possible to aid these people and how it can be done is a problem. There is great danger that they may nearly all be killed or allowed to perish en route. If they arrive anywhere it is still doubtful if they will be within communication. My opinon is that the few who survive the journey will be taken to some remote part of the Mesopotamian plain many days' journey from Urfa or any other town. Should they be within reach of Urfa relief might be arranged through the American Mission in that town or through our Consulate at Aleppo. In any case, there is going to be terrible suffering and great need to help among those who survive the journey. Those who were formerly rich and the poor will alike be destitute. If any possible measures can be taken for their relief I feel that now is the time to begin.

It is impossible for me to give any adequate idea of the panic in this locality that has resulted from the announcement of this order of expulsion. The people have been given four or six days to dispose of everything they have and leave. For the merchants to wind up their affairs in that short time is difficult. It is also difficult for householders to dispose of their household and personal effects. The result has been a panic such as has never been known here or in few other places. Every one who is obliged to leave is trying to get together a little money to take on the journey. The Turks are, of course, taking advantage of the situation to get things at practically nothing. Robbery and looting were never undertaken in a more wholesale manner. Turkish men and Turkish women are entering the houses of all the Armenians and taking things at almost any price. As nearly half the population are leaving they have to take what they can get. This is rarely more than five or ten per cent, of the value. All the furniture in a house, costing originally one or two hundred pounds will be sold for ten or fifteen pounds. Rugs that cost five or ten pounds are sold for fifty or seventy-five piasters. The people are glad to get anything at all for their merchandise or effects. The streets are full of camels carrying off the loot and of rich Turks and Turkish women dressed in their finest gowns, who are making a holiday of the occasion. The scene reminds one of a lot of hungry vultures hovering over the remains of those who have fallen by the way. A more disgusting sight than that which is taking place here now can scarcely be imagined.

The difficulty for people to get ready to leave at such short notice was so great that on Tuesday six of us, comprising practically the entire foreign male population of the town, called on the Vali unofficially to enquire if it would be possible to have a greater length of time given the people before leaving. He received us very courteously but said that was impossible. We did succeed, however, in having a clear understanding that we could help the people in certain ways. The Vali said that there was no objection to our buying things from them or having them leave their money in our care. The Kaimakam has interfered in carrying out this purpose, but on the whole we have been able to do quite a good deal. The Missionaries have also tried to furnish the people with medicine and other useful articles for their journey and some of the poorer and needier ones have been given cash.

During the last three days crowds of people have visited the Consulate and the American Mission for help of some kind. Many have wanted financial assistance, while others have wanted to leave things in our care. They have brought money, documents, jewelry, furniture, and many other things. I have taken documents, and some money, while the missionaries have taken much more than I have. Some have left money to be paid in any case to relatives in America, but most have left it on condition that if nothing is heard from them in four or six months it is then to be sent to their relatives. I have never seen a more pathetic or tragic scene. All feel that they are going to certain death and they certainly have good reason to feel that way. Their confidence in the American missionaries and in the Consulate is touching. Some of them don't even want to count the money they are leaving. They hand over the savings of a lifetime with the simple request that if they are not heard from after a few months to send their money if possible to their relatives.

All real estate belonging to Armenians will be confiscated by the Government. Many people will be unable to dispose of their personal property and will probably walk out leaving their houses and stores with all their contents. Those who have made fortunes will lose everything. Some will, of course, take a moderate amount of money with them, but all fear being robbed and very few will dare take much money with them. For those who are feeble and have no money at all, it is a question what will become of them. The Government has offered to furnish donkeys for them, but charges an enormous price per day for every donkey. A man who starts out with only one or two liras will find after a few days that all his money is gone and will be absolutely stranded.

The effect industrially and commercially of the expulsion of the Armenians from this region is going to be to throw it back in the middle ages. It is officially stated that ninety per cent of the trade and of the business carried on through the banks is that of Armenians. Business of all kind will now be destroyed beyond the possibility of it being restored. In some trades there will be no mechanics or workmen at all. It is difficult to understand how those Turks who have had any taste of civilisation at all will be able to live unless exceptions are made and there does not seem to be any indication of that. There will be no banks, no Christian schools, no Christian churches. With one stroke the country is set back two, three [sic] hundred years. The same will be true of Diyarbakir and of all other parts of this consular district.

There is no doubt in my mind that all the American Missionaries will be obliged to leave. It will not surprise me at all if they are ordered to go but whether they are expelled or not there will be nothing for them to do here. The labors of the missionaries at Harput, which have continued during more than sixty years, have come to an end and I see no way in which they will be able to continue their work here.

With the destruction of all business and the departure of the Missionaries, there will be no object in maintaining a consultate either here or at Diyarbakir or in any other part of this region. There is great danger that I may lose at this time two indispensable employees, both of whom have been with the Consulate for more than ten years, but they are both Armenians, I have asked the Vali to allow them to remain, but the only promise he would give me was that they would not be obliged to go with the first lot. He said they could remain here for a few days and in the meantime he would ask for instructions from Constantinople about them. In my telegram of June 28th, I asked the Embassy to request exemption for them, but I do not believe my telegram ever reached the Embassy.

In my telegram of June 27th, I asked the Embassy to wire me also if it would be possible to secure exemption for the naturalized American citizens who are here. I spoke to the Valie about this at once but he has been very evasive. I hope to receive some reply from the Embassy in time, if it is going to be possible to do anything to save any of these people and their children. There is one class of citizens who are certainly entitled to protection. There are women whose husbands are naturalized American citizens and are now in America, while they have returned here for a short time to visit relatives. There are several of these and nearly all of them have children with them who were born in America. I shall certainly do everything possible to save these.

Tomorrow the exodus of one-half of the population of this region commences. Were the people not so entirely subdued I should expect to see some stirring scenes. As it is, I can hardly think it possible that the authorities will succeed in sending everyone into exile, but as yet there does not seem to be any sign of their relenting or of their granting many exemptions.

I have the honor to be, Sir, Your obedient servant,

(Signed) LESLIE A. DAVIS,
Consul.

AMERICAN CONSULATE,
MAMOURET-UL-AZIZ (HARPUT), TURKEY,
July 11, 1915.

Hon. HENRY H. MORGENTHAU,
American Ambassador,
Constantinople.

SIR: I have the honor to supplement my report of June 30th (File No. 840.1) in regard to the expulsion of the Armenians from this region, as follows:

On July 1st a great many people left and on July 3rd several thousands more started from here. Others left on subsequent days. There is no way of obtaining figures but many thousand have already left. The departure of those living at Harput was postponed, however, and many women and children were allowed to remain temporarily. People began to hope that the worst was over and that those who remain might be left alone. Now it has just been announced by the public crier that on Tuesday, July 13th, every Armenian without exception, must go.

If it were simply a matter of being obligated to leave here to go somewhere else it would not be so bad, but everyone knows it is a case of going to one's death. If there was any doubt about it, it has been removed by the arrival of a number of parties, aggregating several thousand people, from Erzurum and Erzinggan [sic]. The first ones arrived a day or two after my last report was written. I have visited their encampment a number of times and talked with some of the people. A more pitiable sight cannot be imagined. They were almost without exception ragged, filthy, hungry and sick. That is not surprising in view of the fact they have been on the road for nearly two months with no change of clothing, no chance to wash, no shelter and little to eat. The Government has been giving them some scanty rations here. I watched them one time when their food was brought. Wild animals could not be worse. They rushed upon the guards who carried the food and the guards beat them back with clubs hitting hard enough to kill them sometimes. To watch them one could hardly believe that these people were human beings.

As one walks through the camp mothers offer their children and beg one to take them. In fact, the Turks have been taking their choice of these children and girls for slaves, or worse. In fact, they have even had their doctors there to examine the more likely girls and thus secure the best ones.

There are very few men among them, as most of them have been killed on the road. All tell the same story of having been attacked and robbed by the Kurds. Most of them were attacked over and over again and a great many of them, especially the men, were killed. Women and children were also killed. Many died, of course, from sickness and exhaustion on the way and there have been deaths each day that they have been here. Several different parties have arrived and after remaining a day or two have been pushed on with no apparent destination. Those who have reached here are only a small portion, however, of those who started. By continuing to drive these people on in this way it will be possible to dispose of all of them in a comparatively short time. Among those with whom I have talked were three sisters. They had been educated at Constantinople and spoke excellent English. They said their family was the richest in Erzurum and numbered twenty-five when they left but there were now only fourteen survivors. The other eleven, including the husband of one of them and their old grandmother had been butchered before their eyes by the Kurds. The oldest male survivor of the family was eight years of age. When they left Erzurum they had money, horses and personal effects but they had been robbed of everything, including even their clothing. They said some of them had been left absolutely naked and others with only a single garment. When they reached a village their gendarmes obtained clothes for them from some of the native women. Another girl with whom I talked is the daughter of the Protestant pastor of Erzurum. She said evey member of her family with her had been killed and she was left entirely alone. These and some others are a few survivors of the better class of people who have been exiled. They are being detained in an abandoned schoolhouse just outside of the town and no one is allowed to enter it. They said they practically are in prison, although they were allowed to visit a spring just outside the building. It was there that I happened to see them. All the others are camped in a large open field with no protection at all from the sun.

The condition of these people indicates clearly the fate of those who have left and are about to leave from here. I believe nothing has been heard from any of them as yet and probably very little will be heard. The system that is being followed seems to be to have bands of Kurds awaiting them on the road to kill the men especially and incidentally some of the others. The entire movement seems to be the most thoroughly organized and effective massacre this country has ever seen.

Not many men have been spared, however, to accompany those who are being sent into exile, for a more prompt and sure method has been used to dispose of them. Several thousand Armenian men have been arrested during the past few weeks. These have been put in prison and each time that several hundred had been gathered up in that way they were sent away during the night. The first lot was sent away during the night of June 23rd. Among them were some of the professors in the American college and other prominent Armenians, including the Prelate of the Armenian Gregorian Church of Harput. There have been frequent rumors that all of these were killed and there is little doubt that they were. All Armenian soldiers have likewise been sent away in the same manner. They have been arrested and confined in a building at one end of the town.

No distinction has been made between those who had paid their military exemption tax and those who had not. Their money was accepted and then they were arrested and sent off with the others. It was said that they were to go somewhere to work on the roads but no one has heard from them and that is undoubtedly false.

The fate of all the others has been pretty well established by reliable reports of a similar occurrence on Wednesday, July 7th. On Monday many men were arrested both at Harput and Mezreh and put in prison. At daybreak Tuesday morning they were taken out and made to march towards an almost uninhabited mountain. There were about eight hundred in all and they were tied together in groups of fourteen each. That afternoon they arrived in a small Kurdish village where they were kept over night in the mosque and other buildings. During all this time they were without food or water. All their money and much of their clothing had been taken from them. On Wednesday morning they were taken to a valley a few hours' distant where they were all made to sit down. Then the gendarmes began shooting them until they had killed nearly all of them. Some who had not been killed by bullets were then disposed of with knives and bayonets. A few succeeded in breaking the rope with which they were tied to their companions and running away, but most of these were pursued and killed. A few succeeded in getting away, probably not more than two or three. Among those who were killed was the Treasurer of the American College. Many other estimable men were among the number. No charge of any kind had ever been made against any of these men. They were simply arrested and killed as part of the general plan to dispose of the Armenian race.

Last night several hundred more men, including both men arrested by the civil authorities and those enrolled as soldiers, were taken in a different direction and murdered in a similar manner. It is said this happened at a place not two hours' distance from here. I shall ride out that way some day when things become a little quieter and try to verify it for myself.

The same thing has been done systematically in the villages.

A few weeks ago about three hundred men were gathered together at Itchme and Haboosi, two villages four and five hours' distant from here, and then taken up into the mountains and massacred. This seems to be fully established. Many women from those villages have been here since and told about it. There have been rumors of similar occurrences in other places.

There seems to be a definite plan to dispose of all Armenian men, but after the departure of the families during the first few days of the enforcement of the order it was announced that women and children with no men in the family might remain here for the present and many hoped that the worst was over. The American missionaries began considering plans to aid the women and children who would be left here with no means of support. It was thought that perhaps an orphanage could be opened to care for some of the children especially those who had been born in America and then brought here by their parents and also those who belonged to parents who had been connected in some way with the American Mission and schools. There would be plenty of opportunity, although there might not be sufficient means, to care for children who reached here with the exiles from other Vilayets and whose parents had died on the way. I went to see the Vali about this matter yesterday and was met with a flat refusal. He said we could aid these people if we wished to do so, but the Government was establishing orphanages for the children and we could not undertake any work of that nature. An hour after I left the Vali the announcemnt was made that all the Armenians remaining here, including women and children must leave on July 13th.

The evident plan of the Government is to give no opportunity for any educational or religious work to be done here by foreign missionaries. Some Armenian women will be taken as Moslem wives and some children will be brought up as Moslems, but none of them will be allowed to come under foreign influences. The country is to be purely Moslem and nothing else. Some of the missionaries think they would like to remain here and try to work among Moslems. I not only think it would be very dangerous for them to undertake it but do not believe they will be allowed to do anything among [sic] that line. I shall not be surprised, as I have said before, if all the American missionaries are ordered to leave here in the near future. If they are not, they will be so effectually prevented from doing any kind of work that it will be entirely useless for them to remain here. Furthermore, they will be annoyed in many ways by the local officials. I do not think for a moment that they will be allowed to open any of the schools again and it's quite probable that the hospital may be ordered closed. It is very probable as that both the school and the hospital buildings may be seized by the Government. It seems certain that there will not be any work for them to do here and that they will not be permitted to do any work.

Under the circumstances, I think the only wise and safe thing for them to do is to consider the matter of leaving here, temporarily at least, as soon as it may be possible. I realize that it is a serious matter for them to abandon their work, but the present situation is serious too and I fully believe there is nothing else for them to do. It would probably not be best for all of them to leave together, but I am going to advise that some of them leave as soon as it may be safe to go. In the meantime I earnestly recommend that the Embassy bring to the attention of Mr. Peet and the board the possible necessity of all of them leaving here.

I do not think that any of them should go now. In fact, some of them have been quite firmly of the opinion that some one should go at once for the purpose of trying to raise a relief fund for these unfortunate people. To go now would be almost certain death, with bands of Kurds awaiting travelers on every road. I asked the Vali, however, if it would be all right for one or two of the Americans to leave here now to go to Constantinople and then to America and he said very plainly that it would not be safe. He said that no matter how much a guard he gave them it would be dangerous for them to travel at the present moment and advised waiting a few weeks. This confirms the general fear as to the fate of those who are sent away from here. It also indicated that perhaps the authorities do not wish any real harm to befall the Americans. On the other hand, the Vali intimated that possibly the Americans might not be permitted to leave here. Some of them think that we know too much about what is happening in the interior of Turkey and the authorities do not intend [sic] to let any Americans leave here alive to tell about it. I do not think that, but I do think the life of every American here is in danger and that the danger is increasing. If all of the missionaries can get away safely I shall feel greatly relieved. It is not only that the present situation is very critical, but they are constantly doing things that are more or less imprudent. The entire colony may suffer for the imprudence of one person. It is quite natural that they should sympathize with the people among whom they have been working and want to aid and protect them, but there is great danger of carrying their zeal too far and getting into trouble themselves.

With reference to the need of funds for the relief of these exiles, which I mentioned in my telegrams of June 27th and 28th and my dispatch of June 30th I am inclined to believe that there will be no occasion for raising funds. It looks as though there were not going to be any people who can be helped. All who are sent away will probably be killed or die on the road within the next few months and the women and children who are left will probably have to become Moslems.

My attention has just been called to the fact that the post office at Mamouret-ul-Aziz has refused to pay out money to the Americans that has been sent them from Erzurum and Erzincan for the exiles who have come here. It is probable that the Government will confiscate this money. I do not know whether the Embassy would care to take any measures about this or not. The money is addressed to the Americans, but it is intended for the Armenian exiles.

Embassy's telegrams Nos. 19 and 20 have been received. I have seen the Vali about the naturalized American citizens and their children and about the consular staff. He said he had received no instructions about them, as I telegraphed this morning. I have now just received word that the consular staff and two or three women whose husbands are in America may stay here for the present. There seems to be nothing very definite about any of it. I shall be very glad to have these women leave as soon as it is reasonably safe for them to go. I hope it can be arranged for the employees of the Consulate, however, to remain here permanently, or at least as long as there may be a Consulate. It would be impossible to find any one to take their place.

I have the honor to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

(Signed) LESLIE A. DAVIS,
Consul.

AMERICAN CONSULATE,
HARPUT, July 24, 1915.

Hon. HENRY MORGENTHAU,
American Ambassador,
Constantinople.

Sir: I have the honor to further supplement my reports of June 30th and July 11th (File No. 840.1) in regard to the expulsion of the Armenians from this region, or to speak more correctly, the wholesale massacre of these Armenians, as follows:

Any doubt that may have been expressed in previous reports as to the Government's intention in sending away the Armenians have [sic] been removed and any hope that may have been expressed as to the possibility of some of them surviving has been destroyed. It has been no secret that the plan was to destroy the Armenian race as a race, but the methods used have been more cold-blooded and barbarous, if not more effective, than I had at first supposed. It was apparent that very few would ever survive the journey from here to Urfa or to any other place at this season of the year. As a matter of fact, it has been quite unnecessary to consider the difficulties of such a journey. It seems to be fully established now that practically all who have been sent away from here have been deliberately shot or otherwise killed within one or two days after their departure. This work has not all been done by bands of Kurds but has for the most part been that of the gendarmes who accompanied the people from here or of companies of armed "çetes" (convicts) who have been released from prison for the purpose of murdering the Armenian exiles.

It has been repeatedly reported, and I think there is no doubt about the truth of these reports, that not a single man who has been sent away has been spared. Many of the women and children have been deliberately killed at the same time. A few of the more attractive women have been carried off to adorn the harems of some of the Kurdish chieftains and of some of the gendarmes. Some of the older women and children have been allowed to wander along, accompanied by gendarmes, with the certainty that all of them will soon perish from hunger, sickness and exhaustion.

I do not believe there has ever been a massacre in the history of the world so general and thorough as that which is now being perpetrated in this region or that a more fiendish, diabolical scheme has ever been conceived by the mind of man. What [sic] the order is officially and nominally to exile the Armenians from these Vilayets may mislead the outside world for a time, but the measure is nothing but a massacre of the most atrocious nature. It would be that even if all the people had been allowed to perish on the road [sic]. As the greater part of them, however, have been actually murdered and as there is no doubt that this was done by order of the Government, there can be no pretense that the measure is anything else but a general massacre.

Fully 12,000 or 15,000 Armenians have now been sent away from the town of Mamouret-ul-Aziz and the city of Harput. Possibly 1,000 or 1,500 remain with permission or through bribery or in hiding. Many thousand have also gone from the neighboring villages. In all, probably a third of the population of this region is gone. The most remarkable feature of the situation is the helplessness of the Armenians and the total lack of resistance on their part. With two or three insignificant exceptions, there has not been a blow struck by any of them. I have been told that two or three gendarmes have been killed in the villages but probably not a half a dozen in all. It did not seem possible that such an order could be carried out without more or less violence. One would think that some would have chosen death here, knowing that it awaited them a few hours after their departure, and many talked that way, but when the time has come all have started without making any resistance. This has been due partially, of course, to the lack of spirit in the Armenian race, but it is due very largely also to the clever way in which the scheme has been carried out.

Everything was apparently planned months ago. First a few who were said to have been involved in a revolutionary plot were arrested. Some bombs were found and further arrests were made. Those who were arrested were subjected to terrible tortures and were made to confess to much that was probably not true and to accuse many who were entirely innocent. Orders were given that all arms of every kind must be surrendered to the authorities. People were tortured until they confessed that they had a gun or revolver or something when they actually had none at all. Then they would pay some Turk a fabulous price for some kind of a weapon which they might surrender to the police. Liberal promises were made that if everybody would surrender their weapons there would be no further trouble. The towns and villages were surrounded by gendarmes and nearly every man caught. They were then systematically beaten and tortured, the greater of them without any accusation whatever having been against them. The result was that quite a number of weapons and some bombs were collected by the police. How many of the bombs may have been planted by the police themselves and how many weapons were obtaind by innocent people for the purpose of having something to surrender to the police we shall probably never know. It is certain, however, that many of the people who surrendered some kind of a weapon were never engaged in any revolutionary plot and that there was not even so much evidence against many who were tortured as [sic] the production of a weapon. At the same time this search was being made practically all the leading men among the Armenians were arrested. The authorities insisted most earnestly that all who were thus arrested were involved in the plot against the Government and that none were unjustly arrested. As all proceedings were in private it is impossible, of course, for others to know the truth of such statements, or at least to disprove them, but in the light of subsequent developments it would take a great amount of imagination to believe them. Many hundred of the prominent men were thus cast into prison. They were then sent away and there seems to be no doubt that they were all murdered a few hours' distance from here. Several thousand Armenian soldiers were also arrested and sent away ostensibly to work on the roads somewhere. As far as I know, nothing has ever been heard from any of them and it is known that some of them were shot. There is no doubt that all the others met the same fate.

Then, when practically all the Armenian men had been gotten out of the way and every weapon surrendered or found by the police, it was announced that all Armenians must be deported. Effective resistance to such an order was impossible. The whole scheme was planned so cleverly that the police and gendarmes are able to carry it out with no risk at all to themselves. A few thousand men have thus been able to dispose of 15,000 or 20,000 Armenians from this immediate locality. It appears that the same system has been followed in other parts of this Vilayet and in other Vilayets. It is impossible to say how many Armenians have been killed but it is estimated that the number is not far from a million.

An incident that has proved the fate of those who have left is the death of the bishop or Archbishop, I believe, Mgr. Israelian, of the local Armenian Catholic Church. His departure was postponed for one or two weeks on the grounds that the roads were not safe. Finally, about ten days ago he was given a safe-conduct by the Vali, who had always pretended to be very friendly to him. He left with about forty others, all of whom had been given safe conducts. There had never been any suspicion of any of them and it was thought the Government intended to give them a safe journey. They were given a special guard of gendarmes and all precautions were apparently taken for their safety. Wagons were furnished them. They left here towards evening on July 14th and arrived the next day at Kazim Khan, about eight or nine hours' distance from here. There they met a large number of gendarmes. They were told that they could not travel that road and would have to return and go in the opposite direction. Their wagons were turned around and they came back for about half an hour. Then their gendarmes tied their hands together and led them a short distance from the road. Some of them had prayerbooks and knelt in prayer. These were kicked out of their hands amid curses of the gendarmes and all but three of the party were shot and killed. Among them was Mlle. Marguerite Gamat, a French citizen whom I mentioned in my telegram of December 10th and despatch of December 31st to the Embassy. The three who were saved were attractive women and they were all taken to become Moslem wives. One succeeded in getting free. It was from her that I have obtained the above information. It was likewise one of the survivors who gave me from his own lips the details of the shooting of the eight hundred mentioned on page 5 of my report of July 11th. The exact number is now said to have been 979. Both of these incidents are so thoroughly established that I do not think there is a particle of doubt about them. There have been several survivors of the 979 who have told about that. Evidence of both has also been furnished by the gendarmes themselves.

Another incident that was reported to me the other day was that some of the people who were sent from here were actually burned alive in a cave between here and Diarbakir. This was told me by a gendarme who was with them and who expressed himself as being very strongly opposed to the barbarous treatment the Armenians were receiving.

The shooting and killing of people a few hours after their departure from here is barbarous and shows that the real intention of the Government is not to exile them but to kill them. Yet, on the whole, I am inclined to believe that the sooner they are disposed of the more merciful it is. A lingering but certain death after weeks or months of wandering is worse. After the departure of the parties that arrived here from Erzurum and Erzincan a few hundred of those who were too sick or feeble to continue with the others were left here to die. Their camp is a scene from the Inferno. Greater misery could not be imagined. It was bad enough before when there were several thousand all in a most wretched condition. Now, when only the worst of them are left behind, the scene beguiles all description. The dead and dying are everywhere. Two or three small children may be seen weeping over the dead body of their mother, tugging at her as she lies on the ground with matted hair and staring eyes; other small children almost or quite naked and covered with filth lying curled up on the ground dead or in convulsions; other women and children so emaciated that the profile of the face has the exact appearance of a skull; one small boy wearing part of a shirt and a ragged stocking on one foot was actually only a skeleton; other small children with bloated bodies lying in the sun; very rarely a man, but mostly women and children, all in the last stages of their misery waiting for death to come to their relief. I presume a little food is brought to these people, but most of them are too far gone to need food. Each day there are many deaths and these will continue until all are gone. Dead bodies are to be seen there at any time. These are often left lying in the sun too long, with the result that the air is made fetid with the stench from them and from the human filth that is all around. They are finally disposed of by the gendarmes digging one huge hole right in the midst of the encampment and throwing them all in together.

One sees dead bodies now in all direction and on every road, not only a distance but even on the outskirts of the town itself. People coming from neighboring villages report as many as ten or twelve bodies lying by the roadside in an hour's journey. One man who has succeeded in getting here alive from Sivas says he saw not less than five hundred bodies on that road. The whole country is one vast charnel house, or, more correctly speaking, slaughterhouse.

The fate of those who have been killed or died is sad, but perhaps that of those who have been spared is even worse. Some of the women have been brought right back here. Among these is one pretty girl of thirteen years whose father was one of the most prominent men and had one of the best homes in this region. He has been killed. She was separated from her mother and small brothers and does not know what has become of them. Now at her age she is to marry one of the most brutal petty officers around here and they are to live in her father's house!

I have written strongly about the situation and proceedings here because it is impossible to write about them at all and not do so. It is not that I am in any way a champion of the Armenian race. It is not a race one can admire or among whom I should choose to live. But, whatever the faults of the Armenian people may be and however conclusive may be the proof that some of them have been involved in a revolutionary plot, the punishment inflicted upon these people is so severe, the tragedy is so terrible, that one cannot contemplate it and certainly cannot live in the midst of it without being stirred to the depths of one's nature. When one sees men and women seventy or even eighty years old, lame, blind and sick, innocent women and children and helpless babies sent away to be killed or die and actually sees them dead or dying all around, it is impossible to conceive of any justification that can be urged for a measure so severe.

Yet the local authorities are now apparently trying to find some way of justifying what they have done. The Chief of Police called on me on July 16th and requested me to write the Embassy about the shooting of two or three gendarmes in a neighboring village by some Armenians. I had heard that something of that kind had happened but do not know any of the details of it and have no personal knowledge of the matter. I said I should be quite willing to call the attention of the Embassy to the matter if he wished and suggested that he write me a letter which I would transmit to the Embassy. He agreed to do so.

On July 23rd, after having made my official calls, three of us met together and considered the possibility of taking some step in the name of humanity to have these horrors stopped. We were Mr. Ehmann (a German missionary), Mr. Picciotto (an Austrian, the "Sous-Directeur" of the local branch of the Imperial Ottoman Bank) and myself. We decided to call on the Vali informally and ask him unofficially if the few Armenians who were left here could not be spared. He received us most cordially. We explained our errand and asked him if he would not be willing to send a telegram to Constantinople asking for orders permitting those Armenians who had been left here to that time to remain, suggesting that we should also like to send a mutual telegram to the American, German and Austrian Embassies asking them to take any measures that might be possible to have such orders issued. The Vali has all along expressed his regret at the necessity of taking such measures as he has recently been obliged to do and has pretended to be very much touched by the suffering of the people. He apparently consented at once to our plan and said he should be very glad if such orders could be obtained. Then he imposed a condition, viz., that each of us write a letter to the Vilayet asking to have those remaining here spared, so that he could use these letters as the basis for making a demand on the central authorities. He added that he should like to have as many details in the letters as possible, so that it would appear that all those who were guilty of anything had been sent away and all those who remained were innocent. It was quite evident that His Excellency wanted to have it appear by implication that all who had been sent away were guilty. He said he would have the Chief of Police call on me that evening to explain the matter more fully.

We all met at the Consulate and the Chief of Police called as arranged. He was not at all interested in having a letter from Mr. Ehmann or Mr. Picciotto but insisted strongly that I write a letter to the Vilayet, calling attention to the shooting of some gendarmes by Armenians and to the fact that those Armenians who were guilty of having been engaged in a revolutionary plot had been punished, together with their families and people connected with them, while those who now remained were only innocent women and children. I was to incorporate a similar clause in my telegram, to the effect that the guilty Armenians having been punished and only the innocent ones remaining, it was desired to have the latter spared. I replied that I was absolutely unable to make any statement in regard to who were guilty and who were innocent, that perhaps innocent ones had been punished and guilty ones remained unpunished, that I had no means of knowing which were which, and that it was impossible for me to make a statement of fact in a letter addressed to the Vilayet either in regard to the shooting of any gendarmes or in regard to the guilt or innocence of any particular people. I said further that it was quite irregular for me to address the Vilayet at all in such a matter or to send any telegram about it, that any such action on my part was purely unofficial and on the ground of humanity, and that in any case the most I could do was to make a simple request. He argued and argued and argued that I make some kind of a statement, even though it might be very little. I don't know that I ever saw a more persistent man in my life. He remained until half past one in the morning trying to make me give the Vilayet a statement of some kind. He said orders has already been issued for more severe measures than ever on the morrow, but he might delay their enforcement a little if I would make a statement for him. I told him I should be glad to say anything I could, but I couldn't make any statement about matters foreign to my duties in a letter addressed to the Vilayet and couldn't make statements of any kind unless I knew the facts. We finally left the matter until morning to think it over, as he wasn't willing to abandon his idea.

The next morning I sent word to the Chief of Police that as our request was intended to be made on the occasion of the anniversary of the Constitution and as that day had now passed it might be well to drop the matter. He would not take that for an answer, however, so in the afternoon I called to see him. I told him I couldn't very well write a letter to the Vilayet such as he wished, but, as I had promised before, I should be very glad to call the attention of the Embassy to any matters he might wish to write me about. He decided he would rather tell me than write me (I had been rather surprised that he had ever agreed to write his request), so I shall probably have a call from him soon with such requests as he is able to think of in this connection. I see no harm in writing the Embassy in that way, it being understood that I am simply communicating such matters as I have been requested to communicate and that I am not responsible for the truth of anything that I do not know about personally. The Chief of Police will undoubtedly insist that I report as facts within my personal knowledge such matters as he may tell me about. That, of course, I cannot do, although I fear he will be very persistent in urging something of that kind.

I am inclined to doubt the wisdom of having gone to the Vali at all in regard to the situation. It was not within the line of my duties and for a consul might be construed as an improper interference in local affairs. The situation is so extraodinary and terrible, however, and I have had so much pressure brought to bear upon me from the beginning by both Americans and Armenians to try to do something to help the people that it has been difficult to sit still without making some effort in a friendly way on their behalf. Yet, as the Embassy has made no reply to my telegrams Nos. 15 and 16, of June 27th and 28th respectively, in which I suggested that the Embassy do something, if possible, to have the enforcement of the order of deportation adjourned and spoke of the probable need of funds for the relief of those who were to be deported, I assume that the Embassy did not approve of my suggestions. I do not know that the original telegrams ever reached the Embassy but my confirmation copies mailed on June 29th must have arrived. My own conviction is that interference of any kind either here or elsewhere is both hopeless and unwise under present conditions, but it is a very trying position to be unable to do anything to relieve so much suffering.

In this connection, I shall be very glad to have any instructions or suggestions the Embassy may care to give in regard to the proper policy to pursue and I shall appreciate having the Embassy criticize me freely for any errors I may have made in the past. It is often exceedingly difficult to know what one ought to do and I feel the need of advice.

Referring to Embassy's telegram No. 21, of July 12th, in regard to naturalized American citizens and the consular staff, I think there is no doubt that instructions have been received by the local authorities. They may have come after I saw the Vali on July 10th. Beginning with the following day there seemed to be a decided change of attitude towards these citizens and they were given permission to stay. In view of the fact that very few had papers in good order and that some who had such papers had forfeited all claim to protection as Americans by having alleged on their return to Turkey that they were Ottoman subjects and concealed the fact of their American citizenship, it would probably be found on investigation that most if not all of these had no strict rights. As I understand also that the Turkish Government does not recognize expatriation, it would probably be quite difficult, especially under present conditions, to insist too strongly upon such rights. As it is, I have been able to save a few people and have been glad to be able to do even that little good. Even that has been far from easy, for notwithstanding the papers that had been given them by the authorities permitting them to remain some of them have been driven out of their homes by the gendarmes and their houses sealed up. The gendarmes refused to pay any attention to their papers. Several of these families have come to the Consulate and I am keeping them here temporarily. As soon as it is possible I shall try to find some houses near the Consulate where they can live until it is possible to leave here in safety.

At the present time it is not possible to travel, for it would mean almost certain death in spite of any assurances the Government might give. The killing of the Catholic bishop shows that a safe-conduct is of no value as this time. Even if the Government wanted to give any one a safe journey I don't think it could do so. The roads are filled with bands of Kurds and "cetes" who have been turned loose on travelers and it is a matter of little importance to them whom they rob and kill. I understand that many Turks have been killed while traveling. It seems as though there is a great danger of these people getting beyond all control and overrunning the country. It is now far from safe even in town and any trips outside of the town are attended with considerable risk.

With reference to Embassy's inquiry in telegram No. 21, of July 12th, as to why I telegraph in French, I have to say that about a month or so ago the director of the telegraph office sent me word that he had again received orders that telegrams in English could not be accepted. I subsequently called his attention to the fact that the Embassy telegraphed me in English and then I called his attention to Embassy's inquiry about the matter in the above mentioned telegram. He said he would accept telegrams in English, but as none of them understood English at the telegraph office there might be delay in sending them sometimes in case they had to look outside for someone to censor them. However, I shall try to send them in English and can probably explain their meaning sufficiently so that there will be no delay in their leaving here.

As the danger of being cut off from communication with the Embassy seems to be past for the present, I shall not continue sending telegrams, as I suggested in my dispatch of June 12th (File No. 300), unless there is occasion to do so. I have no doubt that the occasions when they will be necessary will be frequent enough.

I have the honor to be, Sir, Your obedient servant,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
AMERICAN CONSULATE,
Mamouret-ul-Aziz (Harput), Turkey,
September 6, 1915.

Hon. HENRY MORGENTHAU,
American Ambassador,
Constantinople.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose herewith a receipt bearing the Embassy seal for communication from this Consulate sent to the Embassy double registered through the Mamouret-ul-Aziz post office on July 4th under the registry number 912. It was on July 4th that I mailed despatch of June 30th in an envelope addressed to the Embassy and the receipt given for it at this post office bore the number 912.

There is some mystery about this despatch. It was enclosed in a smaller envelope addressed to the Consulate-General to deliver to the Embassy. Both the Embassy and the Consulate-General have informed me that no such despatch has ever been received, yet it is clear that the envelope containing it must have been received by someone who had access to the Embassy seal.

The despatch contained a report of fifteen pages about the expulsion of the Armenians from this region and as there have been frequent rumors that my letters to the Embassy were intercepted I have never been quite sure that my letters would go all right. There was a most peculiar combination of circumstances in this case. In the first place, Embassy's inquiry in its Telegram No. 24, of July 27th, about the date of my last despatch naturally caused me to think that some thing was missing. I did not quite understand the inquiry, however, as the date of my last despatch, which happened to be July 24th, was to recent to explain anything and there was no way to tell what other date the Embasy might have had in mind. I answered Embassy's inquiry by giving the dates of all despatches that had not been acknowledged at that time. Embassy replied by saying that one of my dispatches subsequent to June 29th had been received.

I then recalled that on July 5th an employee of the Mamouret-ul-Aziz post office brought to the Consulate the envelope containing my despatch of June 30th which, as stated above, had been placed in the post office on July 4th and registry receipt No. 912 given for it, saying it had not been examined by the Vali and must be submitted to him before it could be mailed. I explained that, although he examined all the other letters which I sent sealed, it was permitted to send sealed letters to the Embassy without showing them to the Vali I then went to the post office myself and saw the director. I asked him why this letter had to be shown the Vali when there was permission to send them direct to the Embassy sealed and I had been doing so every few days for the last year. He said the employees had made a mistake and that the letter was all right.

A few days after the receipt of Embassy's telegram of July 27th a certain official said he had actually seen one of my letters to the Embassy which had been opened. On August 9th I sent my telegram No. 26 asking again if my despatch of June 30th had been received. On receiving Embassy's telegram No. 28, of August 11th, saying it had not, I sent my telegram No. 28 on August 14th, in which I said I had been informed that the local authorities had opened and read my recent despatches to the Embassy. I also telegraphed the Consulate—General asking if the despatch of June 30th had been received and the answer said it had not come. In answer to Embassy's telegram No. 29 asking me to wire numbers and dates of recent despatches I sent my telegram No. 30 on August 17th giving the dates of mailing and numbers of Mamouret-ul-Aziz post office receipts. The first one in the list was July 4th receipt No. 912, this being the one containing my despatch of June 30th. Then when Embassy replied by telegram No. 32 saying it could not check my mailing list I answered by my telegram No. 34 giving more fully the date of each despatch with the date of each despatch with the date of mailing and number of the receipt for it.

On the same day, August 23rd, I wrote the Vali asking him to have the letter traced. Then the enclosed and receipt came in an envelope from the Embassy containing a confirmation copy of a telegram. I have received no answer from the Vali as yet and have heard nothing further from the Embassy.

In view of all the circumstances—the refusal of the employee of the post office to send the letter before it had been examined by the Vali, the assertion of one of the local officials that he had seen one of my letters to the Embassy that had been opened (and he still insists that is so), the inquiry from the Embassy about the date of my last despatch, and the telegrams from both the Embassy and the Consulate—General saying it was natural to think this letter had been intercepted; and, notwithstanding the enclosed receipt bearing the Embassy seal, it is apparent that something had happened to the letter. Is it possible that letter never arrived and the Embassy seal was fraudulently impressed upon the receipt by some one?

I shall appreciate it if the Embassy will investigate the matter and inform me. In case the despatch has been lost I can make a copy of it and forward to the Embassy.

I have the honor to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

Consul.

Hon. HENRY MORGENTHAU,
American Ambassador,
Constantinople.

SIR: I have the honor to continue my reports of June 30th, July 11th, July 24th and August 23rd (File No. 840.1) in regard to the expulsion and massacre of the Armenians, as follows:

The short report of August 23rd was written at the request of the Chief of Police and is based on data which he furnished me. The circumstances which led to my writing it were explained quite fully in my report of July 24th, on pages 9 to 13. The Chief of Police sent me a memorandum of the incidents mentioned therein and I then wrote the report. I showed it to the Vali before sending it and he expressed himself as being much pleased that I was sending a report of these matters. Some of them I know about personally and I have no doubt that all the statements are entirely correct, as I have been assured by the Chief of Police. I can see no harm whatever in reporting these matters to the Embassy and it seems to me that the Vali and the Chief of Police attach too great importance to my doing so. I certainly have no desire to pose as a champion of the Armenian race or to defend any Armenian revolutionists. Hence, in reporting about general conditions I desire to do so with impartiality and gladly mention any incidents that may tend to justify the Government in the measures it has been taking. At the same time, most of the incidents mentioned in my report of August 23rd seem so trivial and insignificant in comparison with the enormous tragedy that is being enacted in this region that it is difficult to see how they can be considered to be any justification for it.

With the exception of this short report submitted on August 23rd, I have not written the Embassy about the Armenian question since my report of July 24th. One reason why I have not written during this time was the apparent uncertainty of my letters reaching the Embassy, as I indicated in my despatch of yesterday regarding my despatch of June 30th. Whether these fears were well founded or not, there is a decided mystery about that letter.

Another reason is that during the last six or seven weeks it has been comparatively quiet here. After the expulsion of the greater part of the Armenian population during the first two or three weeks of July, subsequent deportations have naturally been on a small scale and have occurred at longer intervals. As stated in my report of July 24th, fully 12,000 or 15,000 Armenians have been sent away from the two cities of Harput and Mamouret-ul-Aziz at that time and many thousand more had been sent away from the neighboring villages. Only a small number remained, nearly all of whom were women and children. It was thought, in view of statements made by the Vali, that perhaps these few remaining women and children would be spared. Practically all the men had been sent away and there is little doubt that they were killed, almost without exception.

The deportation had not ended, however, and it is by no means certain that it has ended yet. During the last week of July and the first part of August large numbers of women and children were rounded up both here and in the villages. They were sent away under guard and there have been persistent reports that they were killed as the men had been. This is not at all improbable and I am inclined to believe that at least part of them were deliberately murdered. Recently a large number of Armenian children who had been kept in a Turkish orphanage have been sent away—for what reason except to be killed or to die on the road it is difficult to see. Thus the work of exiling and killing the Armenians has been continuing all summer and it is impossible to foresee the end.

I should estimate that at least three-fourths of the Armenians in this region have now gone. A great many of those who remain have been and still are in hiding. A few are now getting the benefit of the order exempting Catholics and Protestants from deportation, but most of these were sent away before the order was received, or, at least, before it was announced. Those who were fortunate enough to keep in hiding until the order came are now coming out in the open. Only a few days before that, however, a large number of Protestants were sent away and are said to be in the vicinity of Malatia. I have given the Vali a list of eighty-four names and requested that, if possible, they be brought back here, but I have no idea whether he will do anything about it or not. In addition to Protestants and Catholics there are a few indispensable artisans and workmen, such as bakers and shoemakers, who have been left here. The American citizens constitute another very small number. The workers and inmates of the American schools and hospital have also left, although the authorities have continued to deny that any orders have been received from Constantinople about them. As long as they leave these people alone it does not seem best to press the inquiry too far, although they would all be more comfortable to have positive assurance from the local authorities that they are to remain. It seems probable that orders have been received in spite of these denials, just as they were finally received in regard to the naturalized American citizens, although the authorities never expressly admitted it.

By far the greater part of the Armenians who remain, however, are here because they have been successful in keeping in hiding. It is impossible to tell yet how many there may be but there are a great many in this class. Some are hiding in Harput and Mamouret-ul-Aziz, others in the villages and recently a number of men who have been concealed in various places have been going to the Dersim and taking refuge among the Kurds. Their number is naturally limited, but I understand that there has been quite a movement of this kind with fixed prices for protection. Many people, mostly women, have been kept in Turkish houses, especially in the villages that are partly Turkish and partly Armenian. The purely Armenian villages have been pretty thoroughly cleaned out, but hundreds of women have found shelter with their Turkish neighbors in the villages containing both races.

Bribery has, of course, been carried on to a very great extent among officials both high and low. Among the chief offenders in this respect has been the Kaimakam of Harput who is said to have taken many thousand pounds for protecting people. As an instance of how he protected them, one woman I know paid him fifty liras for permitting her and her children to remain. After taking the money he told her she had better not try to stay in Harput while they were sending people away but had better come down to Mamouret-ul-Aziz and hide for awhile. She came to the American hospital and remainded for a few days. Then the hospital was searched by the police and she came down to the Consulate with all her six children. I had previously asked the Chief of police as a favor that she and her children be allowed to remain and he had given his consent. So I kept her at the Consulate for awhile until it was possible to make other arrangements. She has not been able to return to Harput and received very little value for the fifty liras paid the Kaimakam. My efforts on her behalf were worth much more than all he did for money. The Kaimakam carried on the business of taking bribes so systematically and openly that it became known to everybody. Two or three weeks ago he was removed and was subsequently arrested and imprisoned where he has remained ever since. I understand that his house has also been kept under guard since his arrest. I do not know the circumstances that led to his arrest, whether he had not divided his profits with other officials, or what other reason there may have been, but it is a good thing that he is out of office. In addition to the bribery of officials the Turks who have kept Armenians in their houses have almost invariably demanded exorbitant sums for doing so. In very many instances they have kept them for awhile and after getting all their money have turned them out to seek some other shelter. As that has usually been impossible in such cases many of these poeple have finally been exiled after all.

Referring to the arrival at the Consulate of the woman mentioned on the preceding page, who came here from the American Hospital and for whom I had asked permission that she should be exempted from deportation, the way in which she and some others came here one night was most imprudent. The police had learned that there were many Armenians at the American Hospital who were not sick and they paid it a visit one afternoon. The result was not very serious, in view of the large number of people who had taken refuge there. Only about a dozen men were taken away, while all the women and children were left alone. Among those at the Hospital were this woman and her children and one of the professors of the American College. I had received permission for both of these people and their families to remain and had told Dr. Atkinson if there should be any trouble at the Hospital to tell the police that these people were under the protection of the Consulate. The police were told this and passed them by. That evening just after dark my protégés were piloted down to the Consulate together with several others. There were about twenty people who came piling in on me, with blankets and bundles and all their worldly goods. On their way down here they had been stopped by a policeman who asked where they were going, and they had all said they were coming to the American Consulate. They had also been obliged to pass an assembly of Moslems who were holding a meeting in the open air. I sent away at once those who had no permission to remain here, but the coming of so many people in a body naturally attracted a great deal of attention, with the result that it was quickly reported all over town that there were a "thousand" Armenians hiding in the American Consulate. This happened at one of the most tense and critical moments this summer, when it was important to be above suspicion. Fortunately, the incident didn't amount to anything but it was a most thoughtless and imprudent act on the part of the Americans at the Hospital to send people down here in that way.

I have, as a matter of fact, been keeping about thirty or forty people at the Consulate, but they are all people who had permission to remain and whom I could explain, if necessary, like the wives and children of naturalized American citizens and the families of the employees of the Consulate. The arresting and deporting was carried on so vigorously that even those who were supposed to be exempted from deportation were seized and sent off so quickly that no one was safe. Hence, it seemed more purdent for some of those whom I was trying to protect to remain at the Consulate. As the garden of the Consulate is very large it has not been so very difficult to keep people here in summer. I have recently found two or three houses in the neighborhood in which I have placed some of them.

It has been quite difficult, of course, to prevent outsiders from crowding in the American Hospital and it has not been easy to drive them away knowing that they would probably be killed. Considering the number of people who came there on one pretense or another, Dr. Atkinson has had very little trouble on that account. The American missionaries at Harput have had no outsiders but have had about fifty teachers and orphans in their Girls' School and about a dozen servants. As stated above, the authorities have denied continually that any order had been received to exempt them from deportation, but it seems probable they did receive orders of some kind, as no effort has been made to send away any of these persons.

On the whole, the Americans here have had comparatively little trouble during the past two months and have been able to do some good. I have been informed, however, that there was a plot, in which a prominent official was involved, to attack the Americans at Harput one night with a view to robbing them of the money that had been deposited with them by the Armenians who were being sent away. It was known that they had received considerable sums of money and it is not improbable that there were those who coveted it. Neither is it impossible that there may have been such a plot, but I do not know it as a fact. My informer said the official who was involved in it finally decided it would not be wise to undertake it and persuaded the others to abandon the idea.

Whether it is true that there was such a plot or not, the death of Mr. Knapp at Diarbekir (which I reported to the Embassy by telegraph on August 19th and in a despatch dated August 31st) occurred under very suspicious circumstances. Furthermore, there is little doubt that the life of Dr. Smith was in actual danger at Diarbekir and even his deportation from there is not reassuring. There is enough to convince most people that the lives of the Americans are not safe there and if they are obliged to remain it is highly probable there will be other lives lost.

I have just been handed Mr. Peet's circular letter of August 19th to the stations of the American Board in Turkey. It is quite evident that his views of the situation are different from mine. I have no desire to insist unduly upon my own views or to oppose his plans, but after all that has happened there during the last six months, I am unable to see how he can hope to see the American schools open here this fall or how he can say that the return of the instructors who have been sent away can probably be secured or how he can feel that ample protection is assured to all Americans. Mr. Riggs has reported conditions to him most carefully in frequent letters and I have written many lengthy despatches to the Embassy about the situation, but in view of the slight attention that has been paid to our communications, as far as we can see here, and the result as indicated in the above mentioned letter from Mr. Peet, it would seem that little importance has been attached to them.

The situation in regard to the American schools was well summarized in Mr. Riggs' letter of July 19th to Mr. Peet, copy of which was sent the Embassy. He calls attention to the fact that two-thirds of the girl pupils and six-sevenths of the boys have been taken away to death, exile or Moslem homes; that four of the seven professors have been murdered on the road in general massacres; that two of the others are in hiding and that only one (the professor of music) is available; that seven of the twelve male instructors are thought to have been killed on the road, that two were then sick in the hospital, that one is in hiding, and that only two are available; that one had been taken to a Turkish harem, that three had not been heard from, that four had started out as exiles, and that ten only were available; that seven of the eight buildings belong to the American schools were in the hands of the Government, and that only one was left. Part of this remaining building has since been occupied for a hopsital. Thus, three/fourths of the pupils, one-half of the instructors, including all the prinicipal professors, and all except part of one building are now gone. Aside from all other considerations, it is difficult to see how educational work can be carried on under these circumstances and how it can be considered advisable to attempt to open the schools at the present time. The only work that it seems possible to consider at all is orphanage work and the American missionaries have been forebidden to engage in that. The policy that is being pursued openly here in regard to women and children is to compel them to become Moslems. Whatever assurances may be given at Constantinople about the work of American institutions in general, it seems clear that Christian educational work will either not be permitted at all in this region or will be so hampered that it will be useless to attempt to carry it on, unless there should be a radical change in the political situation.

With reference to the directions in Mr. Peet's letter that a request should be made for the return of those instructors in the American schools who have been sent away. I shall, of course, take no steps about that unless instructed to do so by the Embassy. In searching the records of this office for instructions upon such points, I find that this Consulate was instructed by the Legation at Constantinople in 1903, in the case of one of the professors of the American College who was then under arrest and who has now been arrested and murdered, to confine its efforts to the use of good offices and not to interfere officially. As I have received no instructions to the contrary and as the professors and instructors in the American schools were arrested and tortured and sent away and killed before word was received that they should remain in their places, all that I was able to do was to inform the Embassy about the matter, which I did promptly. To ask for their return would be useless, unless it is desired to require the local authorities to explain what has become of them. I don't think they can show that any of these people were guilty of any crime. They were among the first to be sent away because of their position.

With reference to the assurance that ample protection will be given to all Americans in Turkey, the facts do not seem to bear it out. The deportation of Dr. Smith and the probable danger to his life, the suspicious circumstances in connection with the death of Mr. Knapp, the rumors of plots against the Americans at Harput, the fact that Mrs. Barnum's death was undoubtedly hastened by the present situation, and, quite possibly, the deaths of others about which I have not yet been able to obtain the details,—all seem to show that life and health are not secure in the interior of Turkey at the present time. In view of the limited amount of work that can be done by the missionaries now and probably for a long time to come, and the possible dangers and contingencies that may arise at any time, it seems to me more prudent for those who can leave to do so.

Speaking in general of assurances, which are given so freely at Constantinople, and having in mind our experiences here during the past six months, the following passage in a despatch written by one of my predecessors seems of sufficient interest to quote:

"I promptly presented the matter to H.E., the Vali, who assured me that absolutely no orders in this connection had reached him. He telegraphed at once to Constantinople, requesting the transmission of the authorization announced to Your Excellency.

"In the course of our interview, he stated that it was a most deplorable and unfortunate habit of the Ministries at Constantinople to assure the Foreign Embassies that certain orders had been despatched to provincial authorities, altho neither had the instructions been sent, nor were pains taken to forward them promptly after making such statements.

"He had frequently suffered from this exasperating habit, and he advised insisting in all cases upon the date and number of the despatch forwarded with the authorization, as well as the statement whether it was sent as a telegram or letter."

It might be well if the dates and numbers of such despatches could be obtained now and furnished me by the Embassy in each case.

The general conditions in this region are frightful. Aside from the lack of security, it seems as though a pestilence was inevitable. The large number of dead bodies that are lying everywhere, even in the outskirts of the town, the filth from the bands of exiles that have passed through here at different times, and the almost total lack of sanitary measures, are all conducive to that. Men in the employ of the Government now go along the principal roads and bury the dead bodies they find, but the graves they dig are so shallow that the bodies are often partly exposed.

In my previous despatches I have mentioned the camp just outside of the town where the exiles from Erzeroum [sic] and Erzingan stopped for a while. A more suitable place was found for those who arrived later. It is a large cemetery almost in the town itself and enclosed by a high wall. Here bands of exiles who have been passing through have been kept at several different times, while after they left the sick and feeble were left to die and be buried. The scene described on pages 7 and 8 of my despatch of July 24th has been duplicated over and over again in this cemetery. The more recent arrivals of exiles have been kept in an Armenian village about five miles distant, from which everyone had been sent away.

One noticeable feature of the movement has been that lately men have arrived with the parties of exiles, whereas all the men who had started with the first parties had been killed after they had reached this Vilayet. This may be called the "Slaughterhouse Vilayet" of Turkey, for it appears that exiles from all directions have come this far safely only to be massacred in some part of this Vilayet. I have, of course, not seen the actual killing myself, but there can be no doubt about those who have been killed in this Vilayet before arriving here and there is practically no doubt about the killing of the men and of many of the women and children who have left here. It has been corroborated too many times by survivors who have escaped and returned here and by the gendarmes themselves who have done the work. Among the later parties arriving here are people from Zara, in the Sivas Vilayet, and from Trebizond, Ordou, Kherassoun, and another very large party numbering several thousands from Erzeroum [sic]. All with whom I have talked speak of having received much better treatment in the other Vilayets than here. I have been informed that on leaving here the men were in each case separated from the women and children, the significance of which is apparent.

Naturally, with this wholesale massacre being perpetrated almost in front of our eyes, the country is not considered very safe. I have been warned repeatedly by friendly officials and policemen not to take long walks or rides and to always have someone with me. They all speak of the Kurds who are on the roads and are very savage. There are plenty of Kurds, it is true, who are out for plunder. One interesting member of this race visited the Consulate awhile ago with what he thought was a $100.00 bill and asked me what I could give him for it. It proved to be only an advertisement resembling in appearance an American bill. When I asked him where he had obtained it he said at first that some one had given it to him for $100.00 in America and he thought it was good money, but on being questioned a little further he said he had found it in the pocket of a Giaour whom he had killed. Such are the people one is likely to meet here these days.

I have not given up my horseback rides entirely, however, although I have usually taken someone with me. The other day I rode out to two Armenian villages from which almost every inhabitant had been sent away. A short distance out of town two men were digging a few hundred feet off the road. I rode over to see what there might be there. They were digging a grave for a women who lay stretched out on the ground dead. Near her were two other women dying. Besides these there were two other women and one child. They said they wanted to be left there to die instead of being driven on any further. We had some bread with us which we had brought along for any starving person we might meet and we gave them some of it. The men, of course, were Government employees. Such scenes are to be met with almost anywhere probably in the interior of Turkey at the present time. Here a dead women, there a dead baby, occasionally a dead animal. Aside from the dead and the dying and from the gendarmes and Kurds one meets no one on the roads. The country is isolation complete.

The two villages that I visited are almost entirely deserted. Each had two or three thousand inhabitants. One was the home of my stable-boy. There were just two families that had been left there. He is at the Consulate with his family, having been spared because he is one of my servants. His house in the village is occupied by gendarmes. As there are no Turkish inhabitants of this village, these gendarmes and the two Armenian families above mentioned are the only people there now. Probably there are some who have hidden in other villages and may return if conditions become quiet, but there cannot be many such. The village is almost as dead and deserted as Pompeii. The other one to which we went is not much better. There are perhaps half a dozen families there. We found also three feeble, blind old men whose families had all gone and they had been left behind. One was eighty-five years old. He had thirty children and grandchildren, two of whom are in America and every one of the other twenty-eight had been sent to exile and death. All of these old men and their families are Protestants and are well known to the American missionaries. The missionaries have now brought the men from the village and are taking care of them. This village like the other was nothing but ruin and desolation.

There are villages, however, where there are a great many Armenian women left, principally those in which there were both Turkish and Armenian inhabitants. Many women have been kept in Turkish houses in these villages and have thus escaped deportation. During the last few days a large number of women have come to this Consulate for me to write to relatives in America to send them money and almost every one of them has asked for sufficient money to enable them to come to America when it may be possible to travel. I am trying to help them by writing their relatives as requested but they are coming so fast now that it is quite a task. Very many are going to the missionaries for the same purpose. All this indicates the destitute condition in which these people now find themselves and how they all feel that it will be impossible for them to continue to live here.

Word has recently been received from a few individuals who have reached Aleppo. It is to be noted that they are all women. Apparently no men arrived there.

It is going to be a serious problem for the few women and children who remain here to obtain food and clothing this winter. That is something the missionaries will probably consider and they will doubtless be able to render much aid to the people.

I have the honor to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

(Signed) LESLIE A. DAVIS,
Consul.

AMERICAN CONSULATE,
MAMOUTER-UL-AZIZ (HARPUT), TURKEY,
December 30, 1915.

Hon. HENRY MORGENTHAU,
American Ambassador,
Constantinople.

SIR: I have the honor to continue my reports of June 30th, July 11th, July 24th, August 23rd and September 7th (file No. 840.1) about the deportation and massacre of the Armenians in this region, as follows:

The last four months have been full of uncertainty and anxiety for every one. There has been no security for any of the few Armenians who were left here after the deportations of July and August, whether they had been allowed to remain because of their being Protestants, Catholics, American citizens, or for other reasons, and no assurance worth listening to that the Armenian question is ended. The town crier has announced once or twice by order of the Vali that no more Armenians would be sent away and that all could come out without fear, but the falsity of such announcements was shown a few weeks later by the wholesale arrest and deportation of those who had ventured out in reliance upon them. The ruse worked so well that it will probably be repeated and, no matter how many times this may occur, I have no doubt that others will be caught in the same way as long as any remain. There seems to be as much reason to apprehend a further arrest and deportation now of the few Armenians who remain here as there has been at any time during the last six months. No one knows what the next move may be or when it may be made. No one knows whether the few who have escaped thus far will be spared in the end or whether those who are perpetrating this crime, the most awful, probably, that has ever been committed against any race of people, will continue until the last Armenian in the country has been killed.

The predictions made and fears expressed in my early reports upon this subject have been for the most part all too fully realized. As two of them (Nos. 62 of June 30th and 71 of July 24th) were apparently lost in the mails or intercepted by the authorities, I am sending copies of these reports in accompanying despatch No. 172 of yesterday. It will be noticed that they are not reports that were intended to be read by Turkish officials, but I presume that is what has happened to them. The receipt of my reports of July 11th, August 23rd and September 7th has been acknowledged.

In the latter I spoke of the fact on page 4 [p. 169] that a large number of Protestants had been sent away a few days before the order had been received exempting Protestants from deportation. They were said to be near Malatia when the order came and I worked very hard to have them brought back here but without success. A few did succeed in coming back without having been given permission by the authorities. The way in which they did it was by paying Kurds large sums of money, often fifty or a hundred Turkish liras, to bring them here at night. These were mostly women, of course, as nearly all the men had been sent away earlier in the summer. The police hunted down and caught many of those who had returned in this way. They were again sent away and their fate can readily be imagined.

One of the most remarkable incidents in the terrible tragedy that is being enacted has been the sale by the Government at public auction of great quantities of second-hand clothing that had been taken from the backs of the deported Armenians who were killed. Many bundles of such clothing were brought in town and the sale continued in the market-place for many days. I am told that the same thing took place in the other towns of this Vilayet. I saw it going on here myself. One can hardly imagine anything so sordid or *grewsome [sic]. Another act of barbarism still more frightful, which has been related to me by survivors of the massacres, is that the gendarmes sold them in groups of fifty or a hundred to the Kurds who were to kill them and could have whatever they could find on them. As most of the persons deported were thoroughly searched and robbed by the gendarmes the Kurds seldom obtained more than a few old clothes from the persons whom they killed. Thus the so-called "deportation" of the Armenians has been carried on!

Another matter that should be mentioned in speaking of the present situation is the partial destruction of the Christian churches in the surrounding villages. All the churches in this region are, of course, in the possession of the Turks.

On Sunday, September 26th, the Vali had an announcement made that no more Armenians would be deported. For several weeks afterwards everything appeared to be quiet and many Armenians who had been in hiding up to that time ventured to come out. Some became Moslems thinking they would then be in no further danger. Suddenly in the middle of the afternoon on Thursday, November 4th, the day being a fair one when many people were in the streets and market-place, the police began to arrest all the Armenians and Syrians they could find. Many were caught in the streets; houses known to contain Armenians were visited and the occupants dragged out of them including the family of one of my cavasses; the American hospital was surrounded while some of the police entered it and arrested a number found there; a policeman was stationed in front of this Consulate to prevent any one from entering it to seek refuge here; among those arrested and taken to the prison were some of the American citizens whom I had been protecting and a number of other persons for whom I had obtained permission that they could remain. In two or three hours the police gathered together at the prison fully five hundred people from this town. I spent that afternoon and evening and all the next day in going around looking up the different ones whom I had been trying to protect, to see which ones were all right and which ones had been arrested and in visiting the Commander, who was then acting Vali, and the Chief of Police to obtain the liberation of those who had been arrested. The scene that evening, when I visited the Chief of Police a second time with the list of persons arrested whom I wanted released, was one never to be forgotten. Opposite his office was this crowd of prisoners, every one of whom was in danger of death and expecting it but hoping that some one would save them. They were called out of the crowd one by one and brought into the office where I sat with the Chief of Police and the Commander of the Gendarmes. All but one for whom I asked were released. The one exception was a young man who had been a teacher in the Turkish school and was a friend of my clerk. During the summer I had obtained permission for him to remain and had kept him at the Consulate for several months. He had decided, however, to accept Mohammedanism and had left the Consulate a few weeks prior to that time, against the advice of most of us. Then he tried to get back his position in the school and to collect the arrears of his salary. He and two other young men who had also accepted Mohammedanism and tried to collect some money from the Government were taken out of the prison a day or two later and killed a short distance out of town. I have been told on good authority that the principal reason why these young men were not released was because they had tried to collect money from the Government. Human life is cheap here and public officials have an effective method of saving the moneys of the State!

All the Syrians and a large number of the Armenians from this town who were arrested on November 4th were finally released in one way or another. The following day a wholesale arrest of Armenians occurred at Harput but most of them were released. The villages did not fare so well. From many of them the entire Armenian population had already been sent away and killed, as I have previously reported (see my despatch of September 7th, page 17, File No. 840.1, and my despatch of October 9th, page 2, file No. 310). In others, however, quite a number of women and children had been left. Many hundred of these were arrested and brought here on Friday and Saturday, November 5th and 6th. I saw one group of several hundred as they were being driven in here like cattle by a few gendarmes. They had come from a village some distance away and were already exhausted: mothers were carrying their children; one woman was carrying another woman on her back; the old, the lame, the blind, were staggering along dazed and stupefied and if they dropped behind were prodded by the gendames and made to go on. I saw them taken in front of the office of the Chief of Police where orders were given about them and they were sent away. Probably one or two thousand persons were sent away at this time and I have learned their fate from a few survivors who succeeded in getting back here alive. It appears that soon after leaving the town they were separated into small groups and taken in different directions; that those in several of the groups, and undoubtedly those in others also, were led into secluded valleys and then bayoneted by the gendarmes; that after they were killed brush was heaped on their bodies and the gendarmes attempted to burn them. A few are said to have gotten as far as Diarbakir but no word has been received from any of them since that, as far as I have been able to learn, and there is little doubt that practically all were finally killed. It is to be noted that few, if any, of the village people who were deported either at this time or before ever arrived safely at their alleged destination. The few who are known to have arrived anywhere are mostly people from the towns who had some means and were probably able to purchase their lives from the gendarmes who accompanied them but apparently all those from the villages were massacred. In the case of many of the large villages no word has been received from a single person and who was deported from them.

The term of "Slaughterhouse Vilayet" which I applied to this Vilayet is my last report upon this subject (that of September 7th) has been fully justified by what I have learned and actually seen since that time. It appears that all those in the parties mentioned on page 15 of that report, men, women and children, were massacred about five hours distance from here. In fact, it is almost certain that, with the exception of a very small number of those who were deported during the first few days of July, all who have left here have been massacred before reaching the borders of the Vilayet. It is somewhat difficult to understand the plan by which people were brought all the way here from Trebizond, Urdu, Kherassou, Zara, Erzurum and Erzincan, only to be butchered in this Vilayet. During the second week of September several hundred Armenians who had taken grain to Mush for the Government returned here with their ox-carts. Nearly all of them were then put in prison and a few days later were sent out and killed. During the last two months quite a number of Armenian soldiers have been brought back in groups of two or three hundred from Erzurum. They have arrived in a most pitiable state due to their exposure on the way at this season of the year and the privations they had suffered. After all they had endured and after having been brought this far it appears that nearly all of them were killed a few hours after leaving here. A few have escaped and have related how the gendarmes tied them together a short distance out of town. The significance of that was apparent and some resisted. Their dead bodies may be seen alongside of the road. The rest of them are said to have been taken a little farther and killed in the mountains. One of the sad sights of this town now is to see companies of these soldiers being brought here every little while when we know that they are to be butchered like animals. We are all wondering why this Vilayet is chosen as the slaughterhouse.

A striking feature of the present situation in this vicinity is the large number of immigrants who have arrived from the direction of Van, Mush and Bitlis. Many of the Armenian villages that were entirely depopulated during the summer are now filled with these Moslem immigrants. It is thought by some that one reason for destroying the Armenians was to make room for them. At any rate, there seems to be enough of them to fill the vacant places. As they appear to be a very poor class of people, it remains to be seen what the effect will be industrially of this change in the population of this region.

Of nearly a hundred thousand Armenians who were in this Vilayet a year ago, there are probably not more than four thousand left. It has been reported recently that not more than five per cent of the Armenians were to be left. It is doubtful if that many remain now. There are probably more in proportion in the two towns of Mamouret-ul-Aziz and Harput than elsewhere because many have come from the villages in which no Armenians now remain or can live and have sought shelter here. It is estimated that between one-third and one and one-half of the entire existing Armenian population of this Vilayet is now in these two towns and in two or three of the neighboring villages, but the persons above mentioned who have recently come here form a considerable portion of this number. The children in the German orphanage, some four or five hundred in number, form another large element in the remaining population. There are said to be a great many Armenians hiding among the Kurds in the Dersim but it is impossible to estimate the number with any accuracy. There may be five hundred or there may be a thousand in all. In other parts of the Vilayet there are very few and in many of the towns and villages none at all except a few women who have accepted Mohammedanism and are living with Turks.

In my brief despatch No. 170 of yesterday I spoke of the pressure that is being brought on nearly all the Armenian women here, including wives of naturalized Ottomans, to embrace the Moslem faith. As directed in Embassy's Instruction of November 30th, I endeavor to dissuade them from taking this step. A very large number of women have come to me about this matter during the last few weeks. They say they are threatened with deportation, which means almost certain death, if they refuse. It is by no means improbable that this will actually be the result of such a refusal in many cases. I shall do everything possible, of course, to save from either fate all women who are in any way entitled to American protection.

One of the disappointments in the present terrible situation and one of the saddest commentaries on American missionary work among the Armenians is their lack of religious and moral principles and the general baseness of the race. During all that has happened during the past year I have not heard of a single act of heroism or of self-sacrifice and the noble acts, if any, have been very few. On the contrary mothers have given their daugthers to the lowest and vilest Turks to save their own lives; to change their religion is a matter of little importance to most of the people; lying and trickery and an inordinate love of money are besetting sins of almost all, even while they stand in the very shadow of death. On one occasion, when the students of the American theological seminary were arrested, nearly every one of them lied about one thing or another to save himself. Absolute truthfulness is almost unknown among the members of this race. Money is sought at any price, even at the risk of their lives, as in the case of the young man [already mentioned in] this despatch whom I had saved from death and tried to help for several months by keeping him in the Consulate. Every trick and device are resorted to by those who are not in need as well as by those who are to obtain money and often by depriving others of it who are in much greater need. From every point of view the race is one that cannot be admired, although it is one to be pitied.

The present is the time to consider its needs and not its merits. The thousand or two Armenians in this immediate vicinity are for the most part entirely destitute and dependent upon charity. Many are awaiting remittances from America while many others have no relatives there or elsewhere to help them. Practically all who remain here are women and children and a few of them have the means with which to buy bread or any way of earning it. Relief work is being carried on by both the German and the American missionaries but it is not enough to meet the needs at the present time. I shall be very glad to assist in such work as far as I can, as I have been doing with the funds already sent by the Embassy for that purpose and shall do with such additional funds as the Embassy may be able to send.

The important thing is to keep people alive for the present and then to assist them to leave the country as soon as it may be possible. There is no way of knowing however, what further measures may be taken against the few survivors who remain here and the difficulty under present conditions of saving any in case of emergency from the cut-throats of this region is perhaps greater than can be easily realized by those who are living in more civilized places. The only effective way I have found, as I have previously explained, has been to keep people in the Consulate itself and naturally the number who can be saved in that way is limited.

I have the honor to be, Sir, Your obedient servant,

(signed) LESLIE A. DAVIS,
Consul.

In cipher.

I intend to supplement these reports on the deportation and massacre of the Armenians with an account of two trips which now made to a lake about 5 hours distant from here where I saw the dead bodies of fully 10 thousand persons, many of whom had been recently killed, and to illustrate it with photographs which I took of them alive in camps. It would not be prudent to send such a report now.

SOURCE: Leslie A. Davis at Harput to Henry Morgenthau, American Embassy, Constantinople, Dec. 30, 1915, enclosed in Hoffman Philip [Chargé d'Affaires] at Constantinople to Secretary of State, February 17, 1916, N.A., D.S., R.G. 59, Dec. File No. 867.4016/269.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, higher American officials than Leslie Davis, with no political ax to grind, no personal motive to cite the Armenian genocide other than their own observation or their interpretation of the facts that were available to them, have agreed with his account and with numerous others that a systematic extermination took place.

Indeed Davis' immediate superior, Ambassador Morgenthau, concluded in a July 1915 telegram sent to the Secretary of State that "A campaign of race extermination" against "peaceful Armenians" had begun "under a pretext of reprisal against rebellion." And President and Chief Justice William Howard Taft wrote in 1920 that the Serbians and the Armenians shouldered more wartime suffering than any other noncombatants.

President Wilson, deliberating on the growing body of accounts of genocide produced by Davis and by others, instructed his Secretary of State in 1919 to negotiate with Congress about the possibility of sending United States troops to Armenia.

In our own day, with the benefit of historical analysis, members of both parties have not hesitated to voice the truth about this tragedy.

Earlier reference was made to a comment of President Bush. In 1981, at a memorial service in observation of the Holocaust, President Reagan invoked "The genocide of the Armenians" in promising that America would never forget the lessons in human hardship learned from two world wars.

In 1978 President Carter stated that the Ottomans made a "concerted effort to eliminate all the Armenian people."

Yet we need not rely exclusively upon the word of our own countrymen, past or present. We need not do so because in the search for confirmation of the Armenian genocide the Ottoman Government itself, ravaged by war and plagued by some sense of remorse, put the main perpetrators of genocide on trial in 1919.

The empire's indictment against its own Ministers of War, of Interior, and of the Navy, states that through any number of oral or clandestine means these officials authorized what in the language of the indicted was termed "an unending chain of massacres, pillage, and abuse."

At it happens, much of the evidence for the trials also originated in formal telegrams that were in fact instructions from the central Government to the deportation provinces.

It is perhaps hypocritical and certainly a harsh judgment of their peers that resulted in the four authorities who actually received the sentences being sentenced to death. There were additionally four others consigned to 15 years of hard labor.

So it should come as no surprise that the founder of the modern Republic of Turkey, someone revered in Turkish history, Kemal Ataturk, explicitly renounced what he termed the "massacres of millions" by the Ottoman regime.

What has ensued since the time of Ataturk is that, like a free and democratic Germany today, a free and democratic Turkey began a new era in its history with a new government with the rejection of the horror previously visited upon its own minority population.

It is for that reason that a distinguished and valued ally, modern-day Turkey, need not feel anything but the same remorse that all observers anywhere would feel because of this tragedy. We do not visit the sins of the fathers upon the sons, but we do say that once again history teaches that man can be inhumane to other men and there is simply no doubt that that tragedy occurred, and that it must never occur again.

That is the lesson, the lesson so often repeated, from the terrible tragedy that began in 1939 and did not end until the end of the Second World War. "Never again," whether Jew or non-Jew, we have said so many times in attempting to keep faith with the specters of the 6 million Jews who perished during World War II.

Well, this is such an act, Mr. President. It is a resolution that takes pains by its language not to cast doubt in any way, nor to cast blame upon modern-day Turkey or upon the Turkish people. It places blame where, in fact, it is due, where historically, by ample documentation, it was earned; that is, by those officials of the Ottoman Empire who were responsible for this slaughter.

I have been one who on this floor, at every opportunity, has voted to support efforts which I conceive to be in the interest of the United States, as well as in the interests of our ally, Turkey, to enhance the strength of that ally as a valued part of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization Alliance.

It is in no way inconsistent at this moment to voice concern that we not forget, that we memorialize, as indeed we are required by common decency and enlightened self-interest to do, that there shall be at the very least a day to remembrance for those million and a half innocent souls whose sole crime was to be Armenian under the despotic rule of the Ottoman Empire.

There is no shame for modern-day Turkey, any more than we blame the children and the grandchildren of those in modern Germany who did not, by their hand, inflict this terrible wrong upon their Jewish countrymen. What we do know is that there cannot be the kind of indifference that permitted these things to occur in the first place.

And why, Mr. President, am I deluded in my belief that an expression by the Congress of the United States can make a difference? I do not think I am. I think that we have seen concerted world opinion have an impact upon other repressive regimes. I think that we have seen the attitudes changing in Eastern Europe, and indeed the attitudes of the Soviet Union, resulting in such practical results as increased emigration for dissidents, for Soviet Jews and Soviet Christians seeking to leave the Soviet Union.

I think we have learned that it does matter what Members of Congress feel and say and vote. It is a fact that if we are guilty of indifference, we virtually invite history to repeat itself in all of its worst excesses.

So, Mr. President, I will say that, one, there is no doubt that this tragedy occurred and that it was worthy of the terrible name of genocide. I will say, two, that those responsible are long-dead officials of the Ottoman Empire. I will say, three, that it is one more example in history, and all too recent history, still burned and fresh in the minds of those who themselves were survivors of those deportations and massacres.

It is that recent and that real to them, and it must be, if less to us, nonetheless a fact that we mark with at least a decent observation of a day of remembrance, because if we do not do that, Mr. President, we are guilty of indifference and injustice; and we mock the suffering of those who will have died in vain if in fact they are not at least remembered and honored by this day of remembrance, a single, quiet day devoted to these brave souls who fell under the sword of an oppressor.

And, Mr. President, I say to my colleagues who, understandably, are concerned least they give offense to a valued ally, they need, I think to put things in perspective.

It was not long ago that this body went upon record as endorsing a so-called Genocide Treaty. I remember very well that day just a few short years ago, because I was privileged to cast the crucial 67th vote enabling the Senate to adopt the International Convention Against All Forms of Racial and Cultural Genocide.

Those who cast votes that day felt they had done not just a good, but an important thing. They thought that it was a proud day for the Senate, a day when collectively we very properly condemned the evil motives of men in governments that lead them to the incredible inhumanity that permits the systematic extermination of entire populations for no reason other than that by the accident of birth they were born at the wrong time and the wrong place, and to their oppressor, into the wrong culture.

On that day, we declared that these martyred millions of recent history, those who died in the Armenian genocide of 1915 and the Holocaust of the years of the Second World War, would not have died in vain, that their memories would be etched forever in history, that they would be kept alive as people whose suffering must serve at least as an indictment to those responsible for their tragic and inhumane treatment, and more important, as a warning to civilized men that we cannot be indifferent, that we cannot look the other way.

Mr. President, what could be more timely than that when in Azerbaijan, once again it is Armenians who are threatened with genocide?

History does repeat itself, Mr. President, if good and decent men do not do what they ought to in order to prevent the excesses of history. It was Edmund Burke, some centuries ago upon the floor of the House of Commons, who said that "all that is necessary for the triumph of evil is that enough good men do nothing."

We are asking in this resolution to do very little. We are asked to do the decent minimum that is required to pay our respect, and more important, to mark this day not just as a day of remembrance, but as a day of dedication that decent men who call themselves civilized will never again permit this to occur.

Mr. President, I thank the Chair and yield the floor.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE VICE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, on behalf of the Vice President, pursuant to 22 U.S.C. 276d-276g, as amended, appoints the following Senators as members of the Senate Delegation to the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group during the 101st Congress, second session, to be held in Kiawah Island, SC, February 22-26, 1990: the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HOLLINGS], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. MCCLURE], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY], and the Senator from Alaska [Mr. MURKOWSKI].

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum has been suggested and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, Senate Joint Resolution 212, which I cosponsored, designates April 24, 1990, as a national day of remembrance of the Armenian genocide.

Opponents of this resolution have argued that we should not make such a designation because Armenians were not the victims of "genocide."

I disagree. At the beginning of World War I, some 2.5 million Armenians lived in the Ottoman Empire. By 1923, 60 percent of this population—an estimated 1.5 million people—died as a result of the policies of the Ottoman rulers.

Regarding the Armenian culture as alien and the Armenian demand for tolerance and freedom as unacceptable, the empire embarked upon a deliberate campaign to eliminate the Armenian people through deportation and death.

The nature and extent of this campaign was well documented by U.S. officials at the time. For example, Henry Morgenthau, our Ambassador to the Ottoman Empire, reported that "a campaign of race extermination is in progress under a pretext of reprisal against rebellion."

The United States has reaffirmed on several occasions that the actions taken against the Armenian people constituted "genocide." In fact, as a Presidential candidate, President Bush stated that "The United States must acknowledge the attempted genocide of the Armenian people in the last years of the Ottoman Empire * * * if we are to insure that such horrors are not repeated."

I agree with the President, when he said that if we are to eliminate the evil of genocide from the heart of mankind, the death of more than a million Armenians must be more than a tragic footnote in history.

In commemorating the Armenian genocide, we are not criticizing the modern Turkish Government but rather reaffirming our commitment to human life and dignity by keeping the memory of the Armenian genocide alive.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator withhold?

Mr. PELL. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Republican leader, Senator DOLE.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I think we have concluded the debate on the motion to proceed. I thank the distinguished Senator from West Virginia for his generous remarks—not for his opposition, but for his candor, as he always is a man of great integrity, and I hope that we can continue along these lines.

I think from our standpoint we need to convince our colleagues, some who were sponsors and became nonsponsors of the resolution, that history does support our position. There is no doubt about it. It would seem to me that based on the statements we have heard from the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PELL]; the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN]; the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. SIMON]; the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. WILSON], and others who will follow tomorrow, it is our hope to lay the foundation so that we can let history be the judge, and we believe we can make that case and we will continue that tomorrow.

I urge my colleagues who may be trying to make a decision on which way to go, that all we want to do now is to proceed to the resolution—proceed to it. We have the right to have it before the Senate. Then if someone has amendments they can be offered. I have suggested I will offer a substitute which I hope will be less offensive to some. I do not believe the present text should be offensive to anyone, but there are some who are offended and I hope we might be able to resolve some of those problems. In any event, I mentioned earlier the action taken by the European Parliament where their resolution passed in 1987, much stronger than the resolution before us. In fact in one paragraph it says "whereas, the historically proven Armenian genocide has so far neither been the object of political condemnation or received due compensation." They made a finding. We do not do that in our resolution.

I will ask unanimous consent that the entire resolution be printed in the RECORD. I will also ask that the American Bar Association recognition of the Armenian genocide be printed in the RECORD.

The American Bar Association historically protested the Turkish atrocities against Armenians and more recently pointed out the fact of the Armenian genocide. Also the United Nations recognition of Armenian genocide. In 1985 and 1986, after years of study, a U.N. commission recognized the Armenian genocide as historical fact. On August 26, 1985, after 14 years of study and debate, the U.N. Commission on Human Rights voted 14 to 1 with 4 abstensions to reaffirm the Armenian genocide as historical fact. In a March 1979 meeting of the U.N. Commission on Human Rights, the United States publicly supported the United Nations recognition of Armenian genocide by advocating recognition of the Armenian genocide in a commission report.

I ask unanimous consent that these be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION ON A POLITICAL SOLUTION TO THE ARMENIAN QUESTION

The European Parliament, having regard to the motion for a resolution tabled by Mr Saby and others on behalf of the Socialist Group on a political solution to the Armenian question (Doc. 2-737/84).

Having regard to the motion for a resolution tabled by Mr. Kolokotronis on the Armenian question and the declaration of 24 April as Armenian Genocide Day (Doc. B 2-360/85),

Having regard to the report of the Political Affairs Committee (Doc. A 2-33/87),

A. Having regard to: The motion for a resolution by Mr. Jaquet and others on the situation of the Armenian people (Doc. 1-782/81),

The motion for a resolution by Mrs. Duport and Mr. Glinne on behalf of the Socialist Group on a political solution to the Armenian question (Doc. 1-735/83), and

The written question by Mrs. Duport on the Armenian question,[1]

The resolution of the Ministers with responsibility for Cultural Affairs, meeting within the Council of 13 November 1986 on the protection of Europe's architectural heritage,[2] including that outside the territory of the Community,

B. Convinced that recognition of the identity of the Armenian people in Turkey as an ethnic, cultural, linquistic and religious minority follows on from recognition of its own history,

C. Whereas the Armenian side regards these events as planned genocide within the meaning of the 1948 UN Charter,

D. Whereas the Turkish State rejects the charge of genocide as unfounded,

E. Whereas, to date, the Turkish Government, by refusing to recognize the genocide of 1915, continues to deprive the Armenian people of the right to their own history,

F. Whereas the historically proven Armenian genocide has so far neither been the object of political condemnation nor received due compensation,

G. Whereas the recognition of the Armenian genocide by Turkey must therefore be viewed as a profoundly humane act of moral rehabilitation towards the Armenians, which can only bring honour to the Turkish Government;

H. Profoundly regretting and condemning the mindless terrorism by groups of Armenians who were responsible between 1973 and 1986 for several attacks causing death or injury to innocent victims and deplored by an overwhelming majority of the Armenian people,

I. Whereas the obdurate stance of every Turkish Government towards the Armenian question has in no way helped to reduce the tension,

1. Believes that the Armenian question and the question of minorities in Turkey must be resituated within the framework of relations between Turkey and the Community; points out that democracy cannot be solidly implanted in a country unless the latter recognizes and enriches its history with its ethnic and cultural diversity;

2. Believes that the tragic events in 1915-1917 involving the Armenians living in the territory of the Ottoman Empire constitute genocide within the meaning of the convention on the prevention and the punishment of the crime of genocide adopted by the UN General Assembly on 9 December 1948; Recognizes, however, that the present Turkey cannot be held responsible for the tragedy experienced by the Armenians of the Ottoman Empire and stresses that neither political nor legal or material claims against present-day Turkey can be derived from the recognition of this historical event as an act of genocide;

3. Calls on the Council to obtain from the present Turkish Government an acknowledgement of the genocide perpetrated against the Armenians in 1915-1917 and promote the establishment of a political dialogue between Turkey and the representatives of the Armenians;

4. Believes that the refusal by the present Turkish Government to acknowledge the genocide against the Armenian people committed by the Young Turk government, its reluctance to apply the principles of international law to its differences of opinion with Greece, the maintenance of Turkish occupation forces in Cyprus and the denial of the existence of the Kurdish question, together with the lack of true parliamentary democracy and the failure to respect individual and collective freedoms, in particular freedom of religion, in that country are insurmountable obstacles to consideration of the possibility of Turkey's accession to the Community;

5. Conscious of those past misfortunes, supports its desire for the development of a specific identity, the securing of its minority rights and the unrestricted exercise of its people's human and civil rights as defined in the European Convention on Human Rights and its five protocols;

6. Calls for fair treatment of the Armenian minority in Turkey as regards their identity, language, religion, culture and school system, and makes an emphatic plea for improvements in the care of monuments and for the maintenance and conservation of the Armenian religious architectural heritage in Turkey and invites the Community to examine how it could make an appropriate contribution;

7. Calls on Turkey in this connection to abide faithfully by the provisions for the protection of the non-Muslim minorities as stipulated in Articles 37 to 45 of the 1923 Treaty of Lausanne which, moreover, was signed by most Member States of the Community;

8. Considers that the protection of monuments and the maintenance and conservation of the Armenian religious architectural heritage in Turkey must be regarded as part of a wider policy designed to preserve the cultural heritage of all civilizations which have developed over the centuries on present-day Turkish territory and, in particular, that of the Christian minorities that formed part of the Ottoman Empire;

9. Calls therefore on the Community to extend the Association Agreement with Turkey to the cultural field so that the remains of Christian or other civilizations such as the ancient classical, Hittite, Ottoman, etc., in that country are preserved and made generally accessible;

10. Expresses its concern at the difficulties currently being experienced by the Armenian community in Iran with respect to the Armenian Language and their own education in accordance with the rules of their own religion;

11. Condemns the violation of individual freedoms committed in the Soviet Union against the Armenian population;

12. Condemns strongly any violence and any form of terrorism carried out by isolated groupings unrepresentative of the Armenion people, and calls for reconciliation between Armenians and Turks;

13. Call on the Community Member States to dedicate a day to the memory of the genocide and crimes againsty humanity perpetrated in the 20th century, specifically against the Armenians and Jews;

14. Commits itself to making a substantial contribution to initiatives to encourage negotiations between the Armenian and Turkish peoples;

15. Instructs its President to forward this resolution to the Commission, the European Council, the Foreign Ministers meeting in political cooperation, the EEC/Turkey Association Council and the Turkish, Iranian and Soviet Governments and the UN Secretary General;

THE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION'S RECOGNITION OF THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Issue: The American Bar Association historically protected the Turkish atrocities against Armenians, and more recently has pointed out the fact of the Armenian genocide.

POINTS AND AUTHORITIES

1. On February 19, 1988 the ABA submitted the following to the Senate Judiciary Committee in support of the Genocide Convention implementing legislation: As familiar as are the historic examples of genocide against the Armenians and the Jews, genocide is a contemporary crime of shocking magnitude, and we must prepare ourselves to fight it—* * * What is left to do is, somewhat surprisingly, quite simple: The international crime of genocide must be made part of the criminal law of the United States. In a word, we must formally recognize that which even the few opponents of the treaty must surely concede—that in the United States, as in the world, genocide is a crime.—Statement of J. Griffin and J.F. Murphy, ABA, at pp. 4-5.

2. As attorneys applying the legal concept of genocide, the ABA's position carries far more weight than the authorities cited on the other side of the genocide resolution.

UNITED NATIONS RECOGNITION OF THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Issue: In 1985 and 1986 after years of study, the relevant U.N. Commissions recognized the Armenian genocide as an historical fact.

POINTS AND AUTHORITIES

1. On August 26, 1985, fourteen years of study and debate, the U.N. Subcommission on Human Rights voted 14-1 with 4 abstentions to reaffirm the Armenian genocide as an historical fact. U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/1985 SR. 36 (1985). In 1986, the full U.N. Commission on Human Rights adopted that decision.

2. In a March 1979 meeting of the U.N. Commission on Human Rights, the United States publicly supported U.N. recognition of the Armenian genocide by advocating recognition of the Armenian Genocide in a Commission report.

CLOTURE MOTION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, in accordance with my previous indication of the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished President pro tempore, I now send a cloture motion to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The cloture motion having been presented under rule XXII, the Chair directs the clerk to read the motion.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of Rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on the motion to proceed to the consideration of S.J. Res. 212, a joint resolution designating April 24, 1990, as "National Day of Remembrance of the Seventy-Fifth Anniversary of the Armenian Genocide of 1915-1923."

Bob Dole, Pete Wilson, Dave Durenberger, Rudy Boschwitz, Dan Coats, James M. Jeffords, John Heinz, Larry Pressler, Nancy Landon Kassebaum, Pete Domenici, Jake Garn, Paul Simon, Donald W. Riegle, Carl Levin, Alan Cranston, Ted Kennedy, Alfonse D'Amato.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the President pro tempore, Senator BYRD.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I will not long detain the Senate and I will not impose on the time of the two leaders.

I simply want to say again that the Council of Ministers in Turkey has acted last year to open the State archives. And do you not think, may I ask my colleagues, we ought to take the time and let the scholars examine those archives? Documents might be put in the RECORD by Senators, but is that sufficient evidence for 100 Senators to base their judgment upon a matter of this sensitivity?

Some have already formed an opinion.

But I say we ought to stop, look, and listen, before we take a fateful step here to offend a friend, to offend an ally. When we wanted the Turks to fight by our side in Korea, the Senate did not offer a resolution. No Senator offered a resolution at that time decrying the massacre of Armenians in the period 1915-23. In World War II, when Turkey refused to get involved in the fighting on the side of Germany, there was no resolution offered here at that time that would offend Turkey.

Why do we offer such a resolution now? Why is it offered at this time? Why do we go out of our way to insult a friendly ally? What good is it going to do? We hear the plea that we should stand up for human rights. The Senate, time and time again, has stood for human rights. If there were a massacre of Armenians going on in Turkey today, I would join in decrying that. But we are raking over old ashes. Whatever happened 75 years ago should not have happened. It was wrong. But what good will this resolution do? The archives are open. They were just opened last year. Why not let people who have the credibility to do so, go and spend the time to search the records and let a judgment be made by trained historians?

Here we are about to make a judgment. None of us—not one—is in a position to point the finger at Turkey and say Turkey is guilty of genocide.

I think we can understand how the people of Turkey today regret what may have happened, but they cannot call it back. It was their grandparents. And why would we want to take an action which is sure to offend them?

Again, I say that the resolution is innocuous on its face to me. My feelings are not hurt. I am not a Turk. I do not live in Turkey. I was not born in Turkey. My parents did not come from there. My grandparents did not come from there. It is not offensive to me.

But I am interested in maintaining good relations with an ally, an ally that we have had before, an ally that we will want again. Why will we go out of our way deliberately and offend that ally? Why not let some time pass so that the records can be studied, and let someone else make a judgment. That judgment ought not be made on this floor. That judgment ought not be made by 100 Senators who know very little about what any of us are really talking about. That is my plea.

Again, I have only the utmost respect for those who support the resolution, especially the Republican leader. I have called him my friend too many times in this body not to mean it. But my respect for him does not mean that I should not stand up also for what I, too, think is right, and oppose what I think will be a mistake.

I hope we will not get the resolution up on the floor. There would be amendments offered. Who knows whether it would be improved or made worse. I think the best thing we can do is take down the resolution after a cloture vote or two and get on with something else and avoid making a mistake that we cannot undo.

It is easy today to talk. It will be less easy tomorrow to correct a mistake. We may heap coals upon the very people that we are feeling sorry for. We can exacerbate the tensions, the animosities, the hot feelings in the Balkans, and between the Turks and others.

Yes, pass this resolution, if you will. It would be greatly pleasing to the fundamentalists in Turkey. But the Turks, most of the Turks, want to be pro-West. They want to be aligned with the West. Let us not drive them into the hands of fundamentalists who want to turn them away from the West. We saw what happened in Iran. Let us not do something now that can create problems for Turkey, and in creating problems for Turkey also create problems for Greece, create problems for Israel, and create problems for those who are seeking to bring about reforms in the Soviet Union.

I thank the two leaders.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I will just take 1 additional minute. I think the Senator from West Virginia has touched on an issue that I think some would say, well, that is a fair statement. Certainly, everything the Senator from West Virginia has said has been a fair statement. But let us just take a look at the Ottoman archives.

THE OTTOMAN ARCHIVES

The Ottoman archives from 1915 to 1923 should contain important documents on the Armenian genocide. Usually, archives are opened 50 years after the events, but the Turkish Government historically resisted opening the 1915-23 archives. Today, Turkey claims it has opened the relevant archives, and some of those opposed to the resolution will argue that the Senate should await analysis of these archives before approving the Armenian genocide resolution. This argument is specious because: First, the evidence of the genocide is already overwhelming; second, Turkey does not even own all the relevant Ottoman records—they are scattered in U.S.S.R., Vatican, Jerusalem, France, and England; third, according to Turkish sources, Government officials have—for 50 years—combed through and destroyed damaging records; fourth, Turkey, in fact, has not opened all the relevant archives; only the cataloged or the records of these agencies which were not involved in the genocide—War Ministry, Interior Ministry, and Committee of Union and Progress; fifth, the Turkish Government has been using the archives argument as a delaying tactic for years.

POINTS AND AUTHORITIES

Nothing in the Turkish-held archives will change whether a 2,100,000 Armenian population went down to less than 100,000 between 1915 and 1923.

Nothing in the archives can change the existing verified government orders, admissions, third-party observances, and other documents which conclusively establish a government ordered program to annihilate the Armenians.

Nothing in the Turkish-held archives will change the overwhelming evidence of the genocide in the United States, French, British, German, Soviet, Jerusalem, Austrian, and Vatican archives. Remember the United States archives contain approximately 25,000 pages of the details including captured German war records on the planning and implementation of the genocide between 1915 and 1918 alone.

The postwar trials and convictions of government leaders for the annihilation of the Armenians are dispositive evidence from the period, and their transcripts are already available. The exhibits submitted in those trials, however, have not been released by Turkey.

Prominent Turkish historian Dr. Mete Tuncay has claimed that "experts have been combing the Ottoman archives for the last 4 years, putting aside documents that do not support state ideology." Hurriyet Weekly, January 9, 1989.

Western historians have also pointed out that the Turkish Government has deleted the incriminating evidence. For example, Christopher Walker Insight, February 27, 1989; and David Rowan, William Hale, and Dr. James of University College Oxford London Times, January 4, 1989.

At the postwar trials, cabinet members admitted burning or ordering the burning of orders to massacre Armenians.

Because of the disarray in which the Ottoman records were compiled, ascertaining deletions will be almost impossible; therefore, credible historians have not visited and put little stock in the archives opened.

The June 23, 1989, Turkish law opening the archives does not open the relevant archives even though the Turkish government claims that all archives are open. Only archives to 1894 are purportedly open. The law—No. 89/14269 only makes previously "classified" documents from 1895 to 1939—available—that is those which government officials have gone over in recent years. More importantly, the "classified" or "cataloged" records do not include the relevant War Ministry, Interior Ministry, Committee of Union and Progress, or post-war trial proceedings records. Resolution opponents have claimed that the "Council of Ministers" files contain all the relevant decisions on Armenians, but the post-war trials found that was not true.

Even the Turkish press recognizes that the government has been using the archives as a public relations delaying tactic:

Endless and empty statements that have been made over the years concerning the opening of the Ottoman archives, during these days when the Armenian resolution is introduced to Congress, is creating a disturbance among those who follow this topic closely. For the last 8 years, every 6 months a statement is made regarding the opening of the Ottoman archives. That these don't come true indicates that Turkey is pursuing a policy of distraction. Thus there has been a new statement regarding the opening of the archives in Turkey. At any rate, only the sections up to 1895 will be opened. For example, the purported massacre of 300,000 Armenians during the Zeytun events (Sasoon), takes place during this timeframe. However, historians interested in this topic are concerned with history after 1913. Once again Turkey will find itself in the position of not keeping its word. Cumhuriyet, Ufuk Guldemir, January 6, 1989.

TIME TO RESOLVE THE STATUS OF THE WESTERN SAHARA

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I serve as chairman of the Subcommittee on Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs of the Foreign Relations Committee, a region that stretches from Morocco to Bangladesh. During the January recess I traveled in the region: stopping first in Morocco. In recent months our attention has been held by the dramatic developments in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union; unfortunately there has been no comparable change in the persistent problems of North Africa and the Middle East.

One exceptionally persistent problem is that of the conflict in the Western Sahara. It is a war that has lasted 15 years, has cost the participants thousands of lives, and has consumed several billions of dollars of resources. Much of this toll, both human and material, has fallen on the Kingdom of Morocco, a nation with which we have had our longest continuous treaty relationship, dating back to the administration of President Washington, and which has been our closest and most consistent friend in the Arab world.

As part of my visit to Morocco, through the courtesy of the Moroccan Government which provided an aircraft for this purpose, I spent a day traveling to the Western Sahara, visiting the towns of Layoune and Smarra and seeing much of the territory's terrain from the air. The Western Sahara encompasses some 120,000 square miles on the Atlantic coast of Africa. To the north is Morocco; to the east and south are Algeria and Mauritania. The territory's 186,000 people occupy a land that is almost exclusively desert, even the coastal areas, which lack any natural habitation.

The Western Sahara has one significant natural resource, phosphates, of which it holds a sizable percentage of the Earth's total. Following the 1973 oil shocks, the prices of phosphates—which are a substitute for petroleum-based fertilizers—soared and the territory had a brief moment as a valued strategic asset. Since then, however, phosphate prices have collapsed and the Sahara territory has returned to an economically marginal condition.

From 1860 to 1974, the Western Sahara was governed by Spain which, even in the face of U.N. General Assembly resolutions and a newly created insurgent movement, seemed to be determined to make the territory one of the last colonies in Africa. However, on August 20 of that year, General Francisco Franco, until the end a politician canny enough to sense the political winds, announced a referendum on the territory's future. Because of Morocco's claims to the territory, the General Assembly requested an International Court of Justice ruling on the legal status of the territory. Specifically, the Court was asked whether, prior to colonization, the Spanish Sahara had been part of Morocco—to which it might then be returned—or "terra nullius," a no man's land which might then exercise a valid act of self-determination. In October 1975, the Court ruled that the territory had not been terra nullius and had enjoyed an historical connection with Morocco. However, the Court also stated that these connections were not sufficient to deny the Saharouwi—or Saharan—people the right to vote on their own future.

At this point, Morocco's Monarch King Hassan II announced Morocco would peaceably occupy the territory through a "Green March" of 350,000 unarmed citizens. Spain abandoned its referendum plans and instead, via the treaty of Madrid, turned administrative control of the territory over to Morocco and Mauritania. These two nations then partitioned the territory with Morocco holding two-thirds of the land and more than 80 percent of the scattered population.

The Treaty of Madrid was immediately contested by the Polisario, the indigenous liberation organization founded to oppose Spanish rule. More importantly, Morocco's regional rival Algeria moved to support the Polisario materially.

It happens that I was the U.S. Representative to the United Nations at the time of these events. On that occasion the United States sided with Morocco—and, I suppose, with Mauritania. I later set down in writing my view that we were insufficiently attentive to the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice. The General Assembly's clear intent in requesting the opinion, so far as I could assess the matter, had been to press Spain into granting independence to the region in the same matter that almost all African colonies had been granted independence. As I recall, at this time only Djibouti, under French dominion, remained under European rule. Briefly, the Court found that "at the time of Spanish colonization * * * [there were] * * * legal ties of allegiance between the Sultan of Morocco and some of the tribes living in the territory of Western Sahara."

However, as I have stated, the Court did not consider these ties to be of sufficient weight to overcome "the principle of self-determination through the free and genuine expression of the will of the peoples of the Territory. * * *" That is to say, the right of the peoples of Western Sahara to form an independent nation. It was in my personal view at the time that in the case of Western Sahara, and also in the case of East Timor, just then become free of Portuguese rule, the United States was rather too complacent in the face of actions by neighboring states. However, in the case of Western Sahara—not in the case of East Timor—the neighboring state has shown itself more than generous to the peoples involved, fully capable of protecting them, and fully prepared to abide by the outcome of a United Nations referendum. Is that not a principled position, fully defensible in terms of law and equity? I submit to the Senate that it is such, and the position of Morocco ought to not only be supported by the United States, but pressed by the United States. I would recall that we were actively on Morocco's side in 1975 when the rights of the matter were far from clear. Can we be less supportive in the present moment, given the events of the past decade?

On the military front, the Polisario scored early successes against both occupiers and was, by 1979, able to force Mauritania to abandon its portion of the territory. While Morocco then took over the Mauritanian sector, it found itself very hard-pressed. While the absorption of the Western Sahara enjoyed very broad support in Morocco proper—where it was seen as the restoration of historic Moroccan lands—the costs of the war coupled with a series of military setbacks seemed to threaten Moroccan stability and even the monarchy.

Polisario military success was based on an ability to use fast moving transport—mostly landrovers—to stage hit and run attacks on isolated Moroccan outposts. In response to this latter day cavalry attack, Morocco resorted to an even more ancient military device—it built a wall. Or rather a series of walls.

The first earthen wall, or berm, protected the coastal city of Layoune, the administrative capital of the territory and its principal population center. Subsequent walls encompassed other population centers and even larger chunks of real estate. Today the berm runs near the other borders of the territory. While not impenetrable, the wall now effectively keeps the conflict far from any Shararan population centers or economic assets. During my visit to Layoune and the interior town of Smarra, I saw no evidence of the war or, indeed, any particular anxiety about the war.

Estimates of the cost of the war to Morocco range from the Government's claim of $100,000 a day to outside estimates of $1,000,000 a day. Further, these efforts have been accompanied by vast expenditures on economic and social development activities. During my day-long visit, I saw new schools, hospitals, employment training centers, housing, sports facilities, and so on. All such services were, I am told, provided free to the Saharouwi people in the town. The Saharouwis may well be the best provided for populace in all Africa.

Almost a decade ago in 1981, King Hassan II agreed to permit a U.N. supervised referendum on the future of the Sahara. For a number of years, disputes over the nature of the referendum—the wording of the question and the all-important issue of who gets to vote—delayed the holding of a ballot.

These questions have now been resolved. The voters will constitute those Saharouwis registered in the 1974 Spanish census, or about 70,000 people who are still living. Both the enumerated who live in the territory and in the Tindouf—Algeria—refugee camps will be eligible to vote. In total, we might assume an actual electorate of 30,000 to 40,000, with a decision made by 15,000 to 20,000.

While the verification of individuals as those listed in the Spanish census is critical, the overall conduct of this election should not be a costly or complex affair. It has not yet occurred because the U.N. Secretary General has not had the resources to conduct the vote.

One reason for the shortfall of U.N. resources is the extraordinary press of peacekeeping activities—Namibia, Iran-Iraq, Afghanistan. Another is the repeated failure of one country—the United States—to pay its assessed obligations.

For whatever reason, the Sahara War has dragged on too long. It is time to help an old and loyal friend by facilitating an internationally recognized act of self-determination in the Sahara territory.

I also think the international community would be well served by the incorporation of the Western Sahara into Morocco. The last thing we need—the last thing Africa needs—is another impoverished microstate of 180,000. However, this is a decision that is to be made by the Saharouwi people. Morocco has agreed to a vote; the Polisario have agreed to a vote; Algeria has agreed to a vote. Now is the time to hold the referendum on the future of the Sahara and put this issue behind us. Morocco needs to move on and the international community has more pressing challenges, and greater opportunities, with which it must deal.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 2129. A bill to suspend the duty on the personal effects and equipment of participants in the 1993 World University Games; to the Committee on Finance.

SUSPENSION OF DUTY ON PERSONAL EFFECTS AND EQUIPMENT OF PARTICIPANTS IN THE 1993 WORLD UNIVERSITY GAMES

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, in the summer of 1993 some 7,000 athletes from most every nation in the world will arrive in Buffalo for the World University Games. Buffalo was chosen over a dozen American cities to compete with cities in other nations for the honor of hosting the games. Last June Buffalo was awarded this honor. The games have not been held in the United States before, so not many of us know of their stature in the world of international athletics. It is considerable.

I rise to introduce a bill to suspend the duty on the personal effects and equipment of the participants in the 1993 games. This minor change in our tariff schedule would greatly facilitate the arrival of these athletes, and would help the financial situation of those who are making great sacrifices to attend. The same provision has been made for participants in the Los Angeles Olympics and the Goodwill Games.

Mr. President, such a suspension of the applicable duties for this special event would be an appropriate step for us to take. The games will be held in Buffalo, but they are in a very real sense a national event, and one the Federal Government should support. We in Congress passed a resolution affirming our support last year. Let us now take this opportunity to begin to make the games the success they should certainly be.●

By Mr. WIRTH:

S. 2130. A bill to regulate the dumping of waste by the Rail Passenger Service Corp.; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

REGULATION OF DUMPING BY THE RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE CORPORATION

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. President, I have been a longtime supporter of Amtrak and many times have enjoyed riding its trains. But its current practice of disposing human waste directly onto the tracks just cannot be tolerated any longer. Amtrak's response to this problem has been insufficient and inconsistent. We in Colorado try very hard to keep our mountains, canyons, roads, and valleys clean. Amtrak needs to take this matter seriously and they have not. Clearly, congressional action is required.

In response to this problem, today I am introducing legislation to prohibit Amtrak's rather odious practice of dumping untreated human waste from its trains directly onto its rail tracks and stations.

Prior to 1971, all railroads disposed of untreated human waste directly on the railroad right-of-way. However, after a study by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare [HEW], the agency issued regulations under the Public Health Service Act requiring freight and passenger railroads to retrofit their trains to prevent the dumping of waste onto the track bed.

However, in 1976, Congress granted Amtrak an exemption from this requirement and directed that the issue be studied further. HEW reported back that the potential risk of disease was minimal and that given the low amount of passenger train traffic, at the time, and the high cost of retrofitting disposal equipment on cars, Amtrak should remain exempted from the Public Health Service Act. Since then, it has been Amtrak's policy to continue the dumping of untreated human waste directly from its cars, but only in the countryside and provided that trains were traveling faster than 25 miles per hour.

However, Amtrak's policy has not been its practice. In 1987, I contacted Amtrak on behalf of Glenwood Springs, a city in my State. Trains there have been discharging untreated human waste while in the city limits, and even in the local train station. In another instance, 6 months later, railroad workers were sprayed by waste from a passing train. Other complaints were common.

Amtrak assured me that they were taking steps to address this problem and that waste would not be dumped until trains were traveling faster than 35 miles per hour. In addition, onboard personnel were to be instructed not to dispose of waste while within a station, urban, or heavily populated area, or in any areas where crews are working on the right-of-way.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, Amtrak's words appear to be just that: words. Just this past December, a Denver television station filmed a passenger train dumping raw sewage onto the tracks while at a standstill in the Glenwood Springs train station. In addition, it is common to observe trains dumping waste while cruising at speeds less than 35 miles per hour with urban areas.

Mr. President, Amtrak travels through Glenwood Canyon, along the Colorado River. This area is among the most beautiful and scenic in the State. When it rains, the sewage is washed from the tracks and into the waterway. Mr. President, it is time to put a stop to this disgusting and dangerous practice.

The bill I am introducing today would repeal Amtrak's exemption from the Public Health Service Act, and permit the disposal of human waste only at specifically approved facilities. This provision would take effect in 3 years, so that Amtrak has the necessary time to retrofit its cars with appropriate disposal equipment. In addition, the agency would be permitted to levy a service charge, if it so chooses, on its passengers to help pay for compliance with this act.

In the interim, upon enactment of the bill, the Secretary of Transportation would be required to issue regulations prohibiting the dumping of human waste from Amtrak trains while traveling less than 35 miles per hour, within an urban area or within a passenger or freight facility. As an incentive, the Secretary would be authorized to assess civil penalties for noncompliance, up to $25,000 per infraction. This section would give immediate relief to the many municipalities and States which are the victims of Amtrak's current policy.

Mr. President, if airplanes and buses can have sewage tanks, why cannot trains? It is time to put a stop to the careless dumping of sewage along our train tracks and in train stations. Amtrak must have a policy of sensitivity for the environment and public health.

I wish to specially thank residents of Glenwood Springs, Bob Boyle, Mark Welsh, and Fred Clark, as well as the city attorney David Broadwell and the city council of Glenwood Springs for bringing this noxious problem to my attention.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2130

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. REPEAL OF PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE ACT EXEMPTION.

(a) REPEAL.—Section 306(i) of the Rail Passenger Service Act (45 U.S.C. 546(i)) is repealed.

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—Subsection (a) shall take effect 3 years after the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 2. DISCHARGE OF WASTES.

Title VIII of the Rail Passenger Service Act is amended by adding at the end the following new section:

"SEC. 810. DISCHARGE OF WASTES.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—The corporation shall not discharge human wastes, garbage, waste water, or other polluting materials from trains, except at servicing areas approved by the Commissioner of Food and Drugs.

"(b) SERVICE CHARGE.—The corporation may add to all its fares for passenger transportation throughout its system a service charge in the amount necessary to enable aggregate revenues from such service charge to cover the continuing costs to the corporation of—

"(1) complying with subsection (a), including research and development, administrative, construction, and maintenance costs; and

"(2) with respect to the period before the effective date stated in subsection (d), conducting activities necessary to ensure the ability to comply with subsection (a) by the effective date stated in subsection (d).

Revenues from the service charge shall be used exclusively for the compliance costs and activities described in paragraphs (1) and (2).

By Mr. MITCHELL:

S. 2140. A bill to amend provisions of law affecting the use of certain distilled spirits in foreign trade; to the Committee on Finance.

USE OF CERTAIN DISTILLED SPIRITS IN FOREIGN TRADE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce a technical amendment to section 3 of the Foreign-Trade Zones Act to clarify the type of products which are permitted to be processed under the FTZ rules.

The fifth proviso of section 81(c) of the Foreign-Trade Zones Act has for a number of years been a problem for concerns that wish to use ethyl alcohol for the production of articles in an FTZ. This proviso: First, prevents operations in a zone which would be subject to certain provisions of the Internal Revenue Code if performed in the Customs territory; and second, prevents operations involving the manufacture of articles as defined in 26 U.S.C. 5002(14). That section defines articles "to mean any substance in the manufacture of which denatured distilled spirits are used."

In 1988 the fifth proviso was amended by the enactment of 19 U.S.C. 81(c) which states that an article—defined above—may be manufactured or produced from domestic denatured distilled spirits, and articles thereof, in a zone. The word domestic was inserted into this legislative change, and not objected to, because the party requesting the change believed it was using domestic denatured domestic spirits, since it purchased the material from firms in the United States. However, it has now come to light that most of the domestic suppliers import the alcohol and denature it and often also distill it in the United States. This has raised the issue of whether such merchandise is domestic or not within the meaning of the act. This question is compounded by the question of whether words such as domestic, article, et cetera should be interpreted using the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms [ATF] or Customs [FTZ] meanings. Consequently there is need for a further technical amendment.

My amendment would eliminate the issue of whether alcohol used in a FTZ is domestic. The amendment substitutes for "domestic denatured distilled spirits" the expression "denatured distilled spirits which have been withdrawn free of tax from a distilled spirits plant." In addition a new section 81(c) has been added for the purpose of making clear that a person using denatured distilled spirits in a zone as provided for by a proposed subsection (c) will also be eligible for drawback of the tax under 26 U.S.C. 5131(a). The language used in this proposed section 81(e) follows the language in 26 U.S.C. 5131(a). Subsection (c) of the proposed amendment in 26 U.S.C. 5131(a). Subsection (c) of the proposed amendment make it possible to conduct the desired activity in the zone. It will allow the use in a FTX of denatured distilled spirits to manufacture or produce any article other than fuel or alcoholic beverages. In addition, subsection (e) of this amendment will allow drawback on items made from denatured distilled spirits which are produced in a zone and which are already eligible for drawbacks under the current law.

I understand the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms, the Treasury Department, and the Foreign Trade Zones Board are aware of the need to amend current law and have no objection to this amendment. It should be viewed as a revenue neutral, noncontroversial matter.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2140

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That subsection (c) of section 3 of the Act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 999, chapter 590; 19 U.S.C. 81c(c)) is amended—

(1) by striking out "domestic" before "denatured distilled spirits,"

(2) by inserting "which have been withdrawn free of tax from a distilled spirits plant (within the meaning of section 5002(a)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986)" after "distilled spirits",

(3) by striking out "Notwithstanding" and inserting in lieu thereof "(1) Notwithstanding" and inserting in lieu thereof "(1) Notwithstanding",

(4) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of the fifth proviso of subsection (a), distilled spirits which have been removed from a distilled spirits which plant (as defined in section 5002(a)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986) upon payment or determination of tax may be used in the manufacture of production of medicines, medicinal preparation, food products, flavors, or flavoring extracts, which are unfit for beverage purposes, in a zone. Such products will be eligible for drawback under the internal revenue laws under the same conditions applicable to similar manufacturing or production operations occurring in customs territory.".

S. 2141. A bill to temporarily increase the duty on ethyl tertiary butyl ether; to the Committee on Finance.

INCREASE IN DUTY ON ETHYL TERTIARY BUTYL ETHER

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to impose a tariff on imported ETBE which will offset the benefit of the 60-cent-per-gallon blender's credit.

ETBE is not currently manufactured outside of the United States. However, now that ETBE has been designated for eligibility under the blender's credit, concern has been raised that cheap European wine ethanol will be converted to ETBE in order to enter the United States market duty free.

The legislation I am introducing today will impose a 60-cent-per-gallon tariff on imported ETBE which is equal to the existing tariff on imported ethanol. Importers of ETBE for fuel use will recover the full amount of this tariff in the form of a tax credit when the ETBE is mixed with gasoline. Thus, the tariff will not cost a potential foreign manufacturer anything; it will merely prevent these manufacturers from taking advantage of a new tax incentive designed to encourage domestic production.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2141

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. ETHYL TERTIARY BUTYL ETHER.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subchapter I of chapter 99 of the Harmonized Tariff Schedule of the United States (19 U.S.C. 3007) is amended by inserting in numerical sequence the following new heading:

"9901.00.52	Ethyl tertiary butyl ether (provided for in subheading 2909.19.10) and any mixture containing ethyl tertiary butyl ether	15.85¢/ liter.	No change (A, E, IL) 12.6¢/ liter (CA).	15.85¢/ liter.	On or before 12/31/ 92".

(b) STAGED RATE REDUCTION.—Any staged rate reduction of a rate of duty set forth in heading 9901.00.50 of the Harmonized Tariff Schedule of the United States that was proclaimed by the President before the date of enactment of this Act and would otherwise take effect after the date of enactment of this Act shall also apply to the corresponding rates of duty set forth in subheading 9901.00.52 of such Schedule.

SEC. 2. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The amendment made by this Act shall apply with respect to articles entered, or withdrawn from warehouse for consumption, on or after the date that is 15 days after the date of enactment of this Act.

S. 2142. A bill to suspend temporarily the duty on metallurgical fluorspar; to the Committee on Finance.

SUSPENSION OF DUTY ON METALLURGICAL FLUORSPAR

● Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill to suspend temporarily the duty on metallurgical fluorspar. This is a product used almost exclusively by the steel industry.

The duty on metallurgical fluorspar was changed in 1980 from $7.50 per short ton to an ad valorem rate of 13.5 percent in order to help stimulate the domestic industry. This has not happened, and imports of metallurgical fluorspar far exceed domestic production. The Bureau of Mines has reported that reserves of fluorspar in the United States are insufficient to meet domestic demand over the next decade.

Because adequate supplies of domestic metallurgical fluorspar are not available, reliance on foreign fluorspar is necessary. Maintaining the duty on this project is now unnecessary and serves only to harm the domestic steel industry.●

By Mr. DOMENICI:

S. 2143. A bill to establish the Organ Mountains National Conservation Area in the State of New Mexico, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

ORGAN MOUNTAINS NATIONAL CONSERVATION AREA ESTABLISHMENT ACT

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation that will allow the people of southern New Mexico to continue to enjoy the Organ Mountains through the creation of the Organ Mountains National Conservation Area [NCA].

The jagged Organ Mountains loom over the city of Las Cruces in southern New Mexico. Many of the estimated 800,000 residents of Las Cruces and nearby El Paso, TX, have enjoyed the natural and recreational resources of the Organ Mountains and the adjacent Franklin Mountains. Currently, approximately 150,000 people visit these areas each year to camp, hike, and picnic and to observe its rich diversity of wildlife, vegetation, and archaeological resources.

Las Cruces is the 10th fastest growing urban area in the United States, and as the population of the area has grown, the use of the Organ and Franklin Mountains has increased. The Organ Mountains NCA would permit the public to continue to use and enjoy Organ and Franklin Mountains by enhancing the protection and management of the area.

The Organ Mountains NCA, which would be managed by the Bureau of Land Management [BLM], would encompass 58,000 acres in the Organ and Franklin Mountains, 51,000 acres of these lands are already in Federal ownership. Some of these lands are White Sands Missile Range lands, and BLM would enter into a management agreement with the Department of Defense for these lands. The 3,400 acres of private lands within the NCA would be acquired on a willing seller basis only. Acquisition costs are estimated to run $3 to $3.5 million. Grazing, hunting, trapping, and mineral leasing would be permitted. No hardrock mining would be allowed.

The NCA idea developed as the New Mexico congressional delegation was deliberating on proposed BLM wilderness areas in New Mexico. BLM has proposed designating a portion of the Organ Mountains as wilderness. The delegation felt that, although a wilderness area should be created in the Organ Mountains, an NCA also should be created to enhance the protection and management of additional lands in the Organ and Franklin Mountains.

No wilderness would be designated under this bill. Such a designation would await the New Mexico BLM wilderness bill, which the delegation continues to work on.

This legislation follows the enactment in 1988 of legislation that I authored that exchanged BLM land at "A" Mountain in Las Cruces for land owned by New Mexico State University at Aguirre Springs in the Organ Mountains. One of the stated purposes of this legislation was to consolidate BLM lands in the Organ Mountains for the eventual creation of the Organ Mountains NCA.

The Organ Mountains NCA will be the second NCA in New Mexico. In 1987, I authored the legislation that created El Malpais National Conservation Area near Grants. The proposed Organ Mountains NCA is based on El Malpais NCA, and just as thousands have already enjoyed the natural and recreational resources of El Malpais, many people would benefit from the creation of the Organ Mountains NCA.

Mr. President, this legislation would protect a high-quality area for the people of southern New Mexico and southwestern Texas at a relatively low cost. I look forward to quick action by the Senate on this bill.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2143

Either party to an exchange under subsection (a) may pay or accept cash in order to equalize the value of the property exchanged.

SEC. 5. MANAGEMENT PLAN.

The Organ Mountains Coordinated Resource Management Plan, April 1989, Bureau of Land Management, shall be the management plan governing uses within the conservation area. (b) MANAGEMENT RESPONSIBILITY.—Management of those lands within the conservation area west of the topographic crest of the Organ Mountains shall be the responsibility of the Secretary of the Interior. Management of those lands within the conservation area lying east of the topographic crest of the Organ Mountains and west of Fort Bliss shall be the responsibility of the Secretary of the Army.

By Mr. BAUCUS (for himself and Mr. CHAFEE):

S. 2144. A bill to provide for the issuance of super savings bonds to increase national savings and reduce Federal debt owned to foreign creditors; to the Committee on Finance.

SUPER SAVINGS BOND ACT

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, as a chairman of the Congressional Competitiveness Caucus, I rise today to introduce legislation that I hope will encourage Americans to increase their savings. This legislation, the Super Savings Bond Act, is also sponsored by Senator CHAFEE, another chairman of the caucus.

Our legislation requires Treasury to issue Super Savings Bonds [SSB's]. These bonds would be sold through payroll deduction plans in denominations of from $50 to $500. Each purchaser would be limited to $500 in face value per month. The bonds would have a maturity of 12 years and could be redeemed at any time after 5 years from the date issued.

SSB's would yield 97 percent of the 5-year Treasury bond rate. This is a substantial increase over the current savings bond rate.

The objective of this legislation is to encourage all workers to increase their savings rate. Hopefully, the payroll deduction plan will make the difficult task of saving easier.

America's position in the economic world has always been that of the innovator, the pioneer, the leader. Countries like Japan and West Germany built their economies on the blueprints of the powerful United States economic experiment. But as we begin the 1990's, America's economic superiority is slipping from its weakening grasp: imports are increasing and our share of the world market in high technology, manufactured products is falling. We have even reached the point where Japan's dominance of the world semiconductor market could lead to a situation in which the U.S. defense industry must purchase necessary computer chips from foreign countries.

In the battle to maintain our economic competitiveness, many fanciful explanations have surfaced; some dismiss the current lull as a simple lapse in American confidence, and others suggest that the Japanese are waging a secret trade war. Such extreme visions might have an indirect role in the decline of American competitiveness, but direct causes can be pinpointed.

The low savings rate is one of these causes. National savings is directly related to national investment and innovation. That means that a high savings rate is crucial to our international competitiveness.

Unfortunately we may be taking our historical economic success for granted. Backed by public policy and private attitude, the American people have been taking their money out of savings to support their consumer lifestyles. From 1960 to 1980 the United States enjoyed an average national savings rate of 7.4 percent. As the 1980's have passed, this rate has drastically declined and it hit a low of 1.7 percent in 1986.

Some contend that historical trends and economic indicators predict the 1980's to be a time of low private savings worldwide. But comparisons with other countries prove otherwise. Canada, a perennial indicator of the U.S. economy because of its nearly identical economic situation, has experiened an increase in its private savings rate from a steady 7 percent in the 1970's to about 12 percent in the 1980's, almost double that of the U.S. rate.

Canada is not the only country that has a higher savings rate than the United States. Our rate is less than half that of Great Britain, Italy, France, and most other European countries.

The low savings situation can be attributed partially to the Federal Government's inability to pay for its expenditures. Because this public component of national savings is negative, it directly lowers the entire national savings rate. But the deficit accounts for only about half of the total loss in savings. Declines in private savings rates are responsible for the rest.

Since 1960, the private savings rate has steadily dropped from an average of 7.2 percent for the 1960's to a 4.3-percent average in the 1980's. Dramatic declines in household savings account for the total falls in private savings rates. In fact, if adjustments are made for inflation and pension benefits, the personal savings rate has been negative for the last 10 years.

Though the rate has dropped, direct negative effects are hard to recognize. Plants continue to produce, and consumers continue to consume as foreign investors provide an artificial savings pool in place of the one once funded by our own savings. Americans are currently borrowing and investing from this pool, but we are not saving enough to pay for our consumption and investment. And our reliance on foreign investors to supply the missing funds marks the United States as a debtor nation.

Just like any household, this country cannot sustain a permanent debt. We cannot continue to live with high interest rates, increasing foreign investment, and the trade deficit necessary to cover a negative current accounts balance. We must ask ourselves, "how long can the United States borrow before the creditors decide that investment is too risky?" Perhaps never, but a strong economy cannot be built on the tenuous whims of another nation.

We must act. Now. We must increase our savings rate. Raising the savings rate is a necessary change that will give the country control of a strong and reliable economic foundation.

It is with this goal of lifting the United States back to its economic superiority that Senator CHAFEE and I, as chairmen of the Congressional Competitiveness Caucus, are introducing the Super Savings Bond Act. A companion bill has been introduced in the House by Representatives KAPTUR and SCHNEIDER, the House chairs of the caucus.

Our bill would create Super Savings Bonds that are purchased through payroll deductions. The bonds would only be available through payroll deductions so that they will lead to new savings, rather than to shuffling savings between different savings vehicles.

The bonds would be U.S. Government bonds and would be issued in denominations of $50 to $500. They would be issued at 50 percent of face value and would have a maturity of 12 years. An investor could purchase up to a face value of $500 in bonds each month.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2144

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be referred to as the "Super Savings Bond Act".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSES.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) United States net national saving rates have declined from over 7 percent of national income during the 1970s to barely 3 percent of national income in 1989;

(2) the decline in the national rate of saving has forced the United States to borrow massively from foreign creditors, with over $500,000,000,000 borrowed in the years 1985 through 1988 alone;

(3) the outstanding amount of Federal Government borrowing from foreign creditors exceeded $350,000,000,000 as of 1988;

(4) in the years 1985 through 1988, over 40 percent of net national investment in the United States was financed by borrowing from foreign creditors;

(5) the United States economy has been attracting the capital and investment it needs from abroad by selling its assets cheaply, including land, corporations, and securities, through the inducement of an undervalued dollar which makes these assets inexpensive in foreign currency;

(6) net savings rates in the United States are less than ¼ of the net savings rates in Japan, and less than ½ of the net savings rates in the United Kingdom and Canada and in Italy, France, and most other European countries;

(7) current United States savings are not producing enough investment to foster a sound domestic economy; and

(8) a continuation of America's low savings rate will contribute to a lowered standard of living for the average American.

(b) PURPOSES.—The purposes of this Act are—

(1) to increase national savings;

(2) to provide an incentive to the American public to increase savings through regular payroll deductions;

(3) to reduce the amount of foreign credit which has been necessary in recent years to finance the Federal deficit;

(4) to provide sufficient capital for investment in America's future;

(5) to assist in restoring national saving rates from today's level of about 3 percent of national income to the 1970s' average of over 7 percent of national income; and

(6) to assist United States leaders in promoting the purchase of super saving bonds to help strengthen the United States economy.

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, the level of national savings in the United States has been steadily decreasing in recent years. Reversing this trend should be one of the top priorities of Congress.

During the 1970's, the United States saved, on average, almost 8 percent of its national income. By the mid-1980's—1985-87—however, the average savings rate had declined to only 2.1 percent of national income. Such a low rate is unprecedented for periods of economic expansion, not only in the United States, but in all industrialized nations.

According to the National Income and Products Accounts compiled by the Commerce Department, Americans have actually spent more than they have received in spendable income in each of the last 4 years. In 1987, the truly personal component of the savings rate reached a low of negative 2.5 percent.

Senator BAUCUS and I, as the Senate Co-Chairs of the Congressional Competitiveness Caucus, have been studying the effect of our low savings rate on our ability to compete successfully in the global market. The budget deficit and overconsumption by all Americans during the 1980's have caused our reliance of foreign investment to provide most of the investment capital necessary for our businesses and economy to continue expanding.

America's low national savings rate is directly related to our large, unsustainable budget and trade deficits. The economic independence of America continues to be threatened as individuals, corporations, and the Federal Government live beyond their means. As long as this trend continues, the mortgaging of American real estate, factories, banks, and technology to foreign interests will continue.

Given the magnitude of this problem, Government policies should be carefully scrutinized to ensure they encourage saving over consumption by both the Federal Government and the private sector. Our attention should be focused on increasing the supply of domestic investment capital, thus improving the international competitiveness of American businesses and continuing the economic growth we have experienced over the past 7 years.

For these reasons, I believe it is vitally important to take steps to increase our savings rate. The most direct method of increasing national savings is to reduce the Federal budget deficit, which must continue to be our top priority.

In addition, Senator BAUCUS and I are introducing a new type of incentive that will help increase national savings and reduce Federal debt owed to foreign creditors. Under our proposal, the Federal Government would issue higher yield, zero-coupon super savings bonds [SSB's] to encourage saving among working men and women.

These super savings bonds would be non-negotiable with a maturity of 12 years and would be available only through payroll deductions. SSB's could be promoted and sold, at a discount, by banks and other financial institutions in small denominations ranging from $50 to $500, with a limit of $500 in face value per worker during any month. These bonds could be redeemed at any time after 5 years from the issuance date. When they are redeemed, the accrued interest income would be taxed as ordinary income.

This new type of bond has several features that should encourage increased saving. First, SSB's would yield 97 percent of the 5-year Treasury bond rate, a substantial increase over the rate currently offered on savings bonds. This should serve as a valuable incentive to all households, regardless of tax bracket, to increase their saving efforts. Second, the use of payroll deductions should promote a regular pattern of saving, rather than solely encouraging reshuffling current savings. Third, the introduction of these new bonds could become part of a widespread public campaign to encourage increased saving.

Currently, over 47,500 companies have made payroll deduction plans available to their employees for the purchase of U.S. savings bonds. In 1988, 6.6 million employees participated in such plans, purchasing savings bonds totaling over $3 billion. I believe our proposal will attract millions of new savers and billions of dollars in new savings through SSB's.

I hope we can move swiftly on this proposal and make Super Savings Bonds the first step in a national campaign to increase personal, corporate, and government savings. SSB's will provide working men and women with an opportunity to help the Nation regain its economic competitiveness and independence, while also improving their own financial security.●

S. 2145. A bill to designate the Department of Veterans Affairs medical center in Saginaw, MI, as the "Aleda E. Lutz Department of Veterans Affairs Medical Center"; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

ALEDA E. LUTZ DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS MEDICAL CENTER

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I would like to draw your attention to the heroic acts of Aleda E. Lutz, of Saginaw, MI, who died in the crash of an army transport plane during World War II. First Lieutenant Lutz was the first woman pilot to receive the Distinguished Flying Cross and warmly deserves our recognition. Today, along with Senator LEVIN, I am proud to introduce a bill which would rename the Department of Veterans Affairs medical center in Saginaw, MI, as the "Aleda E. Lutz Department of Veterans Affairs Medical Center."

Commended by the Army for "extraordinary achievement," Lieutenant Lutz, or "Lutzy," as she was affectionately known, distinguished herself through her superior professional skill and courage. As a member of the 802d Medical Air Evacuation Squadron, she flew a C-47 hospital plane on over 190 missions, totaling more than 800 flying hours. Lieutenant Lutz's bravery is evidenced by the fact that she was known to volunteer for missions that no other pilots would attempt. In doing so, she helped evacuate some 3,500 wounded soldiers from war zones during World War II. Tragically, Lieutenant Lutz died on November 1, 1944 when her aircraft was caught in a violent storm near Lyon in the south of France.

After serving in military campaigns in Tunisia, Sicily, southern and central Italy, and southern France, Lieutenant Lutz's true heroism earned her the Army's Distinguished Flying Cross. The official citation issued posthumously by the Department of the Army recognized that "her selfless devotion to duty and outstanding proficiency have reflected the highest credit upon herself and the Armed Forces of the United States."

Lieutenant Lutz's courage, however, has not gone unnoticed. On April 8, 1945, the U.S. Army hospital ship, the Aleda E. Lutz, was commissioned. This 16,000 ton ship was the largest hospital ship at sea at the time. It could care for 800 patients, while carrying a complement of 18 doctors, 44 nurses, and 188 enlisted attendants.

Moreover, the Department of Veterans Affairs hospital in Saginaw has been unofficially known as the "Aleda E. Lutz Hospital" for many years. In July 1949, the VA announced that the new hospital in Saginaw would be dedicated to Lieutenant Lutz. Unfortunately, there was never any official designation of the hospital in her name. In reality, however, Lieutenant Lutz has been associated with the hospital in print until 1975 and, on occasion, the hospital is still conversationally discussed in her name. The bill I introduce today, which passed the House of Representatives last year with the support of the entire Michigan delegation, would not only recognize the bravery and courage exhibited by Lieutenant Lutz during World War II, but would rectify the existing situation by officially naming the Saginaw Medical Center after the person in whose name it was dedicated. I urge my colleagues to extend to Lt. Aleda E. Lutz the honor and recognition she deserves by supporting this bill to redesignate the Saginaw VA Medical Center in her name.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2145

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Department of Veterans Affairs medical center in Saginaw, Michigan, shall after the date of the enactment of this Act be known and designated as the "Aleda E. Lutz Department of Veterans Affairs Medical Center". Any reference to such medical center in any law, regulation, map, document, record, or other paper of the United States shall after such date be deemed to be a reference to the Aleda E. Lutz Department of Veterans Affairs Medical Center.●

S. 2146. A bill to clarify the authority of the Small Business Administration to make disaster assistance loans to small businesses in case of disasters determined by the Secretary of Agriculture; to the Committee on Small Business.

SMALL BUSINESS ECONOMIC INJURY DISASTER LOANS AMENDMENTS ACT

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation that would allow all American small businesses to have an equal opportunity to establish eligibility for the Small Business Administration's Economic Injury Disaster Loans [EIDL] Program. I am pleased that Senator CONRAD and Senator BAUCUS join me in seeking a legislative remedy to an SBA policy that is fundamentally unfair in its treatment of rural small businesses affected by drought.

The problem this legislation addresses is simple. Under current law, all small businesses suffering losses in a federally declared disaster are eligible to apply for SBA economic injury disaster loans. However, in the case of drought, SBA administrators have declared that a business must be able to demonstrate that its losses are directly related to the drought's impact on agriculture.

What does this mean in real life? In South Dakota, which is entering its third consecutive year of drought, a feed operator could apply for SBA assistance, but a marina operator on the Missouri River, whose boat ramps have been left on a mud flat 200 yards for the river's edge by drought, cannot.

Was it Congress' intent in establishing the SBA Economic Injury Disaster Loan Program that in the case of drought alone a small business's losses must be directly attributable to a secondary factor beyond the natural disaster itself? I think not.

The legislation I am introducing today does not create a new program. It does not expand the scope of an existing program. It does not authorize additional expenditures for an existing program. All it does is clarify that it is the intent of Congress that all small businesses be able to apply for SBA economic injury disaster loans if they are affected by a federally declared disaster, whether that disaster by fire, flood, tornado or drought.

Mr. President, many regions of the country have been devastated by extended drought conditions during recent years. South Dakota and many of her sister States in the Great Plains are entering a third consecutive year of drought—a condition that is beginning to tear at the very fabric of rural life in the region.

Most Americans see drought in terms of its impact on agriculture and consumer prices. Television brings us vivid snap shots of hard times on the farm and warnings of what we might expect in the way of price increases at the grocery store. What they often don't see is the devastating impact drought can have on another segment of rural society, mainstreet businesses.

Extended drought disrupts normal economic activity for all rural enterprises. In South Dakota, for example, 3 years of drought has severely affected all forms of commerce. Contractors, merchants, and river-based industries have all been hurt by the disaster. With water levels on the Missouri River 25 feet lower than normal, much business activity has ground to a virtual halt.

Rural businesses in South Dakota, seeing no end to this cycle of drought, wonder whether they can last another full year. They ask whether any government program exist that may be able to help them through this disaster. The answer is that there is a program on the books that could provide loans to businesses that suffer economic losses from federally declared disasters, but program administrators have decided, unilaterally, not to implement it.

Mr. President, I have the dubious distinction of representing a State that had two different of Federal disasters declared in 1 year. First, most of the counties in my State were declared drought disaster areas. Later, fires consumed vast forests in the beautiful Black Hills, prompting yet another Federal disaster declaration. While economic injury disaster loans were available to small businesses for both disasters, I experienced a great deal of difficulty explaining to my constituents why all small businesses would be eligible for assistance if they had losses related to the fire, but that only those enterprises that could establish that their losses were directly related to agriculture could receive loans for drought.

This double standard is nothing less than sheer discrimination. A Federal disaster is a Federal disaster. Economic losses from a disaster are counted in the same dollars. As long as we offer a program for economic assistance to small businesses in disaster areas, we should not tolerate overt discrimination by the administering Federal agency.

I am not asking that we increase the funds we expend yearly for economic injury disaster loans. I am just calling on my colleagues to join me in ensuring that all small businesses affected by federally declared disasters are treated equitably. The legislation I am introducing today will do just that.●

By Mr. BOREN (for himself and Mr. COCHRAN):

S. 2147. A bill to provide for certain agricultural trade programs, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

AGRICULTURAL TRADE PROMOTION ACT

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, today I am joining with my distinguished colleague, Senator COCHRAN of Mississippi, in introducing the Agricultural Trade and Promotion Act of 1990.

The growth of the American agricultural sector depends on its ability to sell our products in overseas markets. To help in that effort, Congress has enacted several policy tools to help our agricultural producers develop new markets and to counter heavy export subsidies, especially those of the European community.

For example, Mr. President, I recently chaired a hearing of the Senate Agriculture Subcommittee on Domestic and Foreign Marketing which heard testimony that the European Community spends 10 times the amount of the United States on agricultural export subsidies. The Community will repay their exporters any amount necessary to win markets by selling at a loss.

The 1985 Food Security Act enacted the Export Enhancement Program [EEP] which awards Commodity Credit Corporation certificates for surplus stocks to United States exporters in order to help them counter the European subsidies. The program has been a success. A recent U.S. Department of Agriculture study attributed one-third of our increased grain exports to the EEP. This legislation reauthorizes the EEP and other important agricultural trade programs.

Specifically, the provisions of the bill:

Reauthorize the Export Enhancement Program [EEP] at an increased funding level of $1 billion and specifically provide for transportation costs to be included in the bonus level; increase the level of funding for the GSM Export Credit Guarantee Program under which USDA guarantees commercial loans for the sale of U.S. agricultural exports from $5 to $7 billion; set higher standards for foreign-owned banks to become eligible GSM lenders; require 90 percent or more of the content of GSM-financed shipments to be grown or raised in the United States; establish a revolving loan fund to offer blended credit to Eastern Europe and other developing democracies for the purchase of United States commodities; reauthorize the Targeted Export Assistance [TEA] and Cooperator market development programs with tighter guidelines to ensure accountability and efficiency; continue the antiembargo and contract sanctity provisions of the 1985 Food Security Act; reauthorize the Cottonseed Oil Assistance Program [COAP] and the Sunflower Oil Assistance Program [SOAP]; expand existing programs to allow for two-way exchange of agribusinessmen, researchers, and producers to and from developing democracies in order to facilitate increased agricultural trade.

The trade title of the 1990 farm bill will be one of the first to be considered by the Senate Agriculture Committee, and I believe the provisions of this bill deserve strong consideration.

Failing to take a strong stand for export programs in the new farm bill would send exactly the wrong signal to our competitors while we are in the middle of the GATT negotiations. We must send our competitors a strong signal that U.S. agriculture is in the market to stay. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to cosponsor and support this legislation that is so important to the future of our agricultural sector.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

● Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I join my distinguished colleague from Oklahoma, Senator BOREN, in introducing the Agricultural Trade Promotion Act of 1990, a bill to assist the Department of Agriculture in trade program implementation and to improve U.S. agricultural competitiveness in world markets.

Export and market development programs play a significant role in increasing farm exports and expanding the U.S. production base. This legislation will reauthorize the Export Enhancement Program, Export Credit [GSM programs], Targeted Export Assistance, and the Cooperator Program.

An aggressive agricultural trade policy is important to the success and prosperity of production agriculture in the United States. In 1988, American farmers sold 148 million metric tons of farm products valued at $35 billion. This was the highest volume in 5 years. Last years estimated export sales are valued at almost $40 billion.

Foreign markets are especially important to Mississippians, since nearly 20 percent of the cash value of products from Mississippi farms are marketed through export channels. Last year, Mississippi's share of farm market exports was $610 million. Cotton accounted for over 40 percent of these export sales, while soybeans, soybean products, rice, and poultry accounted for nearly 50 percent.

For the Nation as a whole, it is estimated that 61 percent of the 1989 cotton crop will be exported and that over 50 percent of the rice crop and 30 percent of the soybean crop will be marketed overseas.

This legislation provides commercial export credit guarantees to reduce the effective rate of interest on sales of U.S. agricultural products to emerging democratic nations in Eastern Europe. The bill also includes these fledgling democracies in the Middle Income Countries program, which is designed to assist middle-income countries to develop their agricultural economies. Both the export credit guarantees and the MIC program should expand our trade opportunities in Eastern Europe and complement our other efforts to build democracy and stability in that region.

I hope Senators will join in supporting this legislation to maintain a strong agricultural trade policy for the United States.●

A bill to deny tax-exempt status to certain politically active organizations that are linked to candidates for Federal office, to require that contributions to separate political organizations that are linked to such candidates be treated as direct contributions to the candidate, to restrict "bundling" practices, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

STATUS OF CERTAIN POLITICALLY ACTIVE ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, last year marked the bicentennial of the U.S. Congress. Our Nation, and the Congress, have perservered through difficult times, and triumphed over extraordinary challenges. Our predecessors have bequeathed to us a proud tradition of leadership and public service.

The American people, however, are losing faith in this institution, and that endangers this great legacy. Much of that is the result or loss of confidence in the system used to elect Congressmen and Senators.

Not only do the people believe a 98 percent reelection rate in the House of Representatives is unacceptable, they believe that the campaign system is controlled by special interests seeking special favors.

The activities and statements of Charles Keating, Jr., head of the failed Lincoln Savings and Loan, have been dramatic, recent examples of why the system is being questioned and why we should pursue campaign reform.

We should address these problems. However, if we are to effectively address the problems raised by the Keating controversy, we must avoid the partisan posturing that went on last year and agree to a bill specifically designed to prevent abuses of the letter and spirit of our campaign finance laws. The Keating problem should be clearly understood and not misrepresented in order to advance unrelated agendas.

Mr. President, several special interest groups are hoping to use this situation to advance their own legislative agenda, which has nothing to do with this particular problem. For example, Federal PAC contributions were not even involved in Mr. Keating's practices, so changing what PAC's can do should be debated, but not because of the Keating issue. Similarly, spending limits would have no impact on Keating. Most of Keating's activities involved donations of huge chunks of corporate cash to a candidate's affiliated voter registration organization or to a candidate's State-based political action committee. In fact, spending limits will only encourage Keating-type contributors—in the form of large and undisclosed contributions to various party accounts and special interest organizations.

In Presidential elections, expenditure limits have corrupted the system by putting a premium on evasive campaign finance tactics. Mr. Keating's methods, which shock the sensibilities of congressional watchdogs, are commonplace in the Presidential system, which is governed by spending limits. In fact, these evasive tactics are encouraged by spending limits. To repeat this mistake would not respond to the Keating problem and would be an act of bad faith by Congress in response to a serious campaign finance crisis.

This bill I am introducing today directly addresses the practices which have been criticized in the Keating controversy. What are those problems? There are three.

First, this legislation will deny tax-exempt status to any organization which devotes part or all of its budget to voter registration or other campaign activities and involves a Member of Congress or a Federal candidate in soliciting contributions for such organization. Mr. Keating provided $850,000 in corporate money to a tax-exempt voter registration organization after being solicited by a Member of Congress. I don't think that Members of the House and Senate should be soliciting funds for tax exempt organizations which benefit them politically. It creates an appearance of special interest influence and it makes a mockery of our campaign finance system.

Second, the bill will impose Federal limits and disclosure on contributions to any State PAC or political organization which directly influences Federal elections. Mr. Keating gave $200,000 in corporate money to such an organization. Members of Congress should not be using State-level political organizations as an evasive tactic to avoid the Federal election laws.

Third, the bill restricts Keating-style "bundling" operations. While entirely legal, this practice is one which most observers agree warrants further restriction and I have used the bundling provision language contained in S. 1727, President Bush's campaign finance reform proposal—a package that I was happy to cosponsor earlier this year with Senators DOLE, SIMPSON, and MCCAIN.

Mr. President, these measures are targeted directly at the practices that have been criticized in the Keating controversy. My bill will not dip into the taxpayers' pockets to pay for our campaigns. It will not restrict the right of all citizens to support the candidate of their choice, or favor one political party over the other. This bill is a simple, direct, and balanced response to the problem and will help restore Congress' reputation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following section-by-section summary of my legislation be provided at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEC. 3. CONTRIBUTIONS THROUGH INTERMEDIARIES AND CONDUITS.

Section 315(a)(8) of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 (2 U.S.C. 441a(a)(8)) is amended to read as follows:

"(8) For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) contributions made by a person, either directly or indirectly, to or on behalf of a particular candidate, including contributions which are in any way earmarked or otherwise directed through an intermediary or conduit to such candidate, shall be treated as contributions from such person to such candidate;

"(C) no conduit or intermediary shall deliver or arrange to have delivered contributions from more than 2 persons who are employees of the same employer or members of the same labor organization.".

SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY

Section 1: Denies the tax-exempt status of any organization which: (1) devotes part or all of its operating budget to voter registration, get-out-the-vote campaigns or other political campaign activities; and (2) has a candidate soliciting contributions to, or on behalf of, such organization. The solicitation must be made with organization's cooperation or knowledge.

Section 2: Imposes federal limits on contributions to state political organizations maintained by a member of Congress or federal candidate for office. A contribution to such an organization would be treated as a contribution to a candidate's federal campaign committee if: (1) it is a non-federal political organization regulated under state law and is not a political party committee; (2) the organization is set up by or on behalf of a candidate and it engages in political activity which directly influences federal elections; and (2) a federal candidate or Member of Congress has solicited a contribution for such political organization.

Section 3: Imposes further restrictions on "bundling" activities. This language is identical to the bundling language which has been proposed in S. 1727, President Bush's campaign finance reform initiative. The section prohibits any intermediary or conduit from delivering or arranging to have delivered contributions from more than two persons who are employees of the same employer or members of the same labor organization or trade association.

S.J. Res. 257. Joint resolution to designate March 10, 1990, as "Harriet Tubman Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HARRIET TUBMAN DAY

● Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, as the bells of freedom toll around the globe, it seems appropriate to honor one of America's noble freedom fighters. And so today, in recognition of the memory and continuing legacy of a true founder of American freedom, I am introducing a resolution to designate March 10, 1990, as "Harriet Tubman Day."

Harriet Tubman was born on the eastern shore of Maryland around 1820 and escaped from slavery in 1849. Her freedom, however, was not the beginning of her fight. Even as a child slave, she battled against slavery and injustice. One day, she was ordered by an overseer to help him tie up another slave who was to be beaten. She defied that order and allowed the fellow slave to escape. But in the process, Harriet Tubman paid a high price for her defiance and her convictions. She was inflicted with a wound so severe that it would cause health problems for the rest of her life. The beating was not the first, nor would it be the last. But despite that cruel scar and despite the deep scars of slavery, Harriet Tubman still pursued. With a vigor difficult to imagine, she pursued her seemingly distant dreams and the buried promise of freedom.

Her own freedom was not good enough, though—others were still enslaved. A year after her own escape, Harriet Tubman became a conductor on the underground railroad. She was so successful—she alone led about 300 slaves to freedom—that a bounty, with a horrifying sentence of torture until death, was offered for her capture. Yet, she continued to travel the route of the underground railroad, telling fellow conductor Thomas Garrett that she "ventured only where God sent" and bragging years later that she had "never run off the track or lost a passenger." Time and time again, whenever Harriet Tubman encountered unbeatable odds or insurmountable obstacles, she beat them and surmounted them, forging a path of service, spirit, and strength for all of us to follow.

Through her service—as a conductor on the underground railroad, as a soldier and a tender of soldiers, and as a speaker for those who could not speak for themselves—Harriet Tubman changed the lives of unnumbered Americans of her own time. Through her spirit—Harriet Tubman gave hope to countless slaves who referred to her as their "Moses" and who, because of her, realized that they would one day be led from oppression to the promised land of freedom. Through her strength—a strength that compelled her to risk her own freedom so that others could experience it—Harriet Tubman provides an inspiration of liberty, justice, and opportunity that serves us still. The service, spirit, and strength of Harriet Tubman represents in timeless eloquence much of what is best in us, as Americans and as human beings.

Mr. President, slavery was the darkest chapter in American history. But, out of the darkness always comes the light. Out of the darkness of oppression in Poland came the light of Lech Walesa. Out of the darkness of persecution in South Africa came the light of Nelson Mandela. And, out of the darkness of slavery in America came the light of Harriet Tubman.

Today, that light is kept alive by the Harriet Tubman Historical Society, located in my hometown of Wilmington, DE. Harriet Tubman Day is the brainchild of its executive director, Vivian Abdur-Rahim. The widespread support this commemorative has received around the country—19 States and several cities have already endorsed it—is a result of Vivian's tireless tenacity. She has made a tremendous investment toward establishing this day of recognition and tribute, and I am proud to ask the Senate to add its support to such a worthy and important effort.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas Harriet Tubman—whose courageous and dedicated pursuit of the promise of American ideals and common principles of humanity continues to serve and inspire all people who cherish freedom—died at her home in Auburn, New York, on March 10, 1913: Now, therefore, be it

S.J. Res. 258. A joint resolution to authorize the President to proclaim the last Friday of April 1990 as "National Arbor Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL ARBOR DAY

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr President, in 1970 and 1972, Congress legislated and the President proclaimed the last Friday in April as National Arbor Day. Today, I am introducing a joint resolution which will once again recognize this important day. I am pleased that the 50 of my colleagues have joined me in sponsoring this legislation.

Trees are one of our Nation's most important natural resources. They provide the raw materials for our basic industries, stabilize our environment, and add natural grace to our surroundings. The establishment of a National Arbor Day reminds all our citizens to the vital presence of trees, whether in urban areas or in distant wilderness.

Man's impact on the environment and on the future of our planet is increasingly evident. The importance of trees as a natural resource should compel us to act promptly on the problem of forest decline. Scientists have observed declines, serious damage, and death of a number of species of trees in large areas of Europe and the United States. Damage to forests has ranged from decline in growth of several species of pine in southern New Jersey to widespread damage to the ponderosa pine in southern California.

Because we are concerned about damage to our forests and our trees and because we need to acknowledge the contribution that trees make to our health and well-being, I urge the Congress to designate April 27, 1990, as National Arbor Day. I encourage my colleagues to join us in this effort.

I ask unanimous consent to have the joint resolution printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 258

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is hereby authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the last Friday of April 1990 as "National Arbor Day" and calling upon the people of the United States to observe such a day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

TRIBUTE OF RECOGNITION FOR THE HOSTAGES AND THEIR FAMILIES

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, February is a time of transition, not yet the end of winter, not yet the start of spring, but still a time of great expectation. This sense of patient hope continues to sustain the families and friends of our fellow Americans held hostage in Lebanon.

On February 22 at Calvary Missionary Church in Pontiac, MI, a committee chaired by Mr. Ernest A. May will hold its third annual "Tribute of Recognition for the Hostages and Their Families." They will be joined on this occasion by Virginia Rose Steen, of Clark Lake, MI, wife of journalism Prof. Alann Steen, who was seized January 24, 1987.

Tributes such as this serve to remind all Americans that there can be no real peace until all the hostages are back with their families. And this tribute gives us a common way to express our hope. For the Steens and for all the hostages and families and friends, as certain as spring, there will be freedom.●

HARVEST OF PEACE RESOLUTION, SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 91

● Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, I rise today to express my support for the "Harvest of Peace Resolution" recently submitted by my colleagues Senator HATFIELD and Senator BUMPERS.

I am proud to be a cosponsor of this concurrent resolution because I believe it addresses three of our Nation's major goals for the 1990's—to reverse the arms race, to overcome world hunger and to promote global security through peaceful development.

Mr. President, the move toward more openness in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe is presenting the United States with opportunities that were once unimaginable. Among these is the opportunity to think about nuclear and conventional arms reductions.

This reduction is tensions means we will be able to provide for our legitimate defense at less cost. We will, therefore, have the opportunity to allocate more resources toward overcoming hunger, poverty, and environmental degradation.

Since more than 20 million people in the United States feel the pain of hunger each month and more than 750 millon people worldwide suffer from famine, this reallocation of resources is of critical importance.

In addition, since we have learned that defensive measures alone will never be able to guarantee global security, it is appropriate for us to look to other means for promoting peace. Such measures include building sound economies, helping people meet their basic needs of food, shelter, and health care, and allowing citizens the freedom to participate in their political systems.

The concurrent resolution before us today recognizes that it is time to place these goals at the top of our agenda. It urges negotiations toward the goal of cutting worldwide military spending by the year 2000; renewed efforts for peace where conflicts exist; reallocations of U.S. aid, domestically and overseas, to provide for those who are hungry and without shelter, economic conversion efforts to ease the transition to productive nondefensive work; and reductions in the Federal deficit.

We are at a unique point in history, a point at which goals that once seemed idealistic and are now reasonable and attainable. Let us take advantage of this unique moment in history to pursue these goals and let us start by adopting this concurrent resolution.●

AGRICULTURE AND THE ENVIRONMENT

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, as we begin the initial proceedings of drafting the 1990 farm bill, many people are concerned about the environmental aspects of the bill.

I believe the conservation programs of the 1985 farm bill coupled with voluntary practices by agriculture producers have made U.S. agriculture more environmentally advanced than ever before. Since the 1985 farm bill, 34 million acres of highly-erodible land has been idled under the Conservation Reserve Program, farmers have developed conversation plans that will reduce erosion by more than 1.4 billion tons per year and the USDA has developed a wetlands conservation program and begun a 37-State groundwater quality initiative.

The use of pesticides in agriculture production has increased in the last 20 years. However, total pesticide use has leveled off in recent years. Some use of agriculture chemicals is necessary to save crops and keep food prices low. Even with extensive spraying, pests destroy large amounts of U.S. crops each year.

While all chemicals cannot be eliminated, I believe it is important to encourage methods of farming that rely on decreased usage. Land grant universities, such as Oklahoma State University, have been researching and promoting integrated pest management systems in which all production factors would be integrated for long-term productivity and environmental safety.

Mr. President, I believe the conservation programs of the 1985 farm bill were good, environmentally sound programs. As we begin the process of writing the 1990 farm bill, we must build and expand upon these programs. We must help our American farmers who are the most productive in the world and provide them with workable programs that will not hinder their ability to produce.

I have been working with a group of Senators and major commodity groups to produce a proposal for the 1990 farm bill that will help agriculture producers move toward conservation and environmental goals. The proposal will address water quality, wetlands conservation, integrated crop management and the Conservation Reserve Program. Our proposal is one that considers both agricultural and environmental goals.●

ELKHART COUNTY DRUG TASK FORCE

● Mr. COATS. Mr. President, I rise today to commend the efforts of some of our front line troops on the war on drugs. Although we must ultimately work to curb individual demand, I am greatly encouraged by the intensity of law enforcement officials in cutting drug supply lines and I am heartened by recent events which show that our drug interdiction and enforcement efforts are beginning to pay off. The signals are clear; we are making definite progress in our bid to curb the supply side of the drug problem.

You know you are beginning to make a difference when drug kingpins, fearful of extradition to the United States, announce plans to cooperate with their countries' enforcement efforts. Indeed, some of the Medellin cartel's top bosses have vowed recently to stop peddling their death as long as they are not sent to justice in the United States.

You know you are sending the right signal to drug dealers when law enforcement officials continue to apprehend and judges continue to convict major pushers in our towns and cities.

You know you are sending the right message when people from Nappanee, IN, to New York, NY, rise up and decide enough is enough; we will no longer tolerate drug abuse in our communities. Through the efforts of Federal, State, and local police, we are taking crucial steps toward purging our neighborhoods of the poison of drugs.

One such group has provided other communities with a stellar example of how to battle drugs in the trenches of the war. I want to take this opportunity to single out the inspiring work of the Elkhart County drug task force in my home State of Indiana. This cooperative Hoosier effort has made significant progress in attacking the supply of drugs in Elkhart County.

The drug problem is not restricted to big cities; drugs have taken hold in the fabric of middle America. In fact, per capita drug abuse is actually higher in communities of 10,000 to 25,000 people. As task force officers note: Elkhart County is home to a dozen major pushers operating a network of between 150 and 200 street dealers.

Mr. President, I would like to share the annual report of the Elkhart County task force with my colleagues. I ask that the content of this report be inserted in the RECORD.

The report follows:

ELKHART COUNTY DRUG TASK FORCE

1989 YEAR END REPORT, ELKHART COUNTY DRUG TASK FORCE

The Year End Report of the Elkhart County Drug Task Force reflects a mixed message. Law enforcement has made a great deal of progress in the local "war" on drugs. We have significantly increased our case production, our arrest statistics, and our identification of narcotics dealers and users in Elkhart County. Unfortunately, this has contributed significantly to the overcrowding in the jail and an increase in the case load in the criminal justice system. The paradox is that while all this is positive as it relates to the Task Force efforts, and the Task Force's stated mission, it also reflects on the fact that this community has a significant narcotics and substance abuse problem. The problem is bigger now than when we started our efforts.

If the efforts that have been put forth by the Task Force had been directed at any other type of criminal activity, that activity would, in all likelihood, been eradicated or greatly reduced. Why is this not the case with the "war on drugs"? The answer is, no other criminal activity so completely controls the perpetrator, as is the case in the trafficking and use of illicit drugs.

Burglars are not physically addicted to burglary, purse snatchers are not physically addicted to purse snatching, car thieves are not physically addicted to stealing cars. When all these criminals are free on bond or awaiting trial, they are not totally consumed by the physical and psychological desire to return to their criminal activity.

In addition to the physical addiction suffered by the majority of persons that traffic in narcotics, the higher level dealers are consumed by the high profit return of their criminal enterprise.

No other criminal activity produces the high profit margins. These upper level dealers have an almost endless supply of addicted persons that are willing to make them rich, while they take most of the risks merely for the "reward" of maintaining their habit. No other criminal activity would have this phenomenon occur.

We find ourselves in the midst of the cry for legalization for illegal drugs. More and more persons seem to be proposing this as a solution to the problem.

These proponents claim that we have lost the "war on drugs". I propose that we have yet to begin to fight the "war on drugs". When a law enforcement agency devotes 4 percent of its manpower to drug investigations, when most studies prove that between 65 percent to 80 percent of persons arrested are testing positive for illegal drugs, then a sufficient commitment has not been made. When substance abuse is the single most serious problem perceived by citizens of this community and this country, and we have not made a complete commitment toward dealing with this problem, then we are not fighting a "war". The Drug Task Force has less manpower then was committed to drug investigations in 1980, and only two more officers assigned than were assigned in 1972. War is when one makes sacrifices, when one makes a complete and total commitment to fighting with every resource available. This country is being threatened like it has never been threatened in its history. The substance abuse problem has the potential to literally destroy this country from within.

In addition, what makes the proponents of legalization believe that the major narcotics traffickers will stand idly by and allow this to happen? We have been trying to interdict and arrest these persons for a number of years. Because of our failure to make a total commitment to this effort, it has been less than successful.

Is it reasonable to believe that the major traffickers are going to allow themselves to be legislated out of existence? Not hardly!

Attempts at legalization will almost surely bring about a series of events. Terrorism as we have not experienced, similar to what we are witnessing in Columbia, the development of new and different types of illegal drugs, the black marketing of other drugs presently being sold, a whole new market of younger persons who will not be able to purchase drugs legally.

If the government gets into the business of selling, what are now illegal drugs, the taxation that will be added will be very similar to what is seen in the taxation of distilled spirits and other alcoholic beverages. This increase in price will, most assuredly, create a market for kitchen type lab facilities that are making illegal substances. Add to that, the additional cost to society in the form of additional social programs, domestic violence programs, and added hospital space, certainly makes this approach less attractive.

Prison space to merely incarcerate persons is very expensive, but not nearly as expensive as hospital space.

The legalization of drugs will most likely be restricted to the legal distribution to adults, leaving a large market for teens and adolescents. In the case of the most commonly abused substance, alcohol, a person will most likely not become physically addicted after just one exposure. I have talked to a large number of addicts, however, that have told me that one "hit" on the pipe (crack or ice) and they are addicted. That is a lifetime of addiction.

Is legalization the message that we want our youth in the next generation to receive? If you have a problem, make it legal, then it is no problem?

Totally new and different types of controlled substances will be developed that will be on the market before the Federal government will have a chance to examine these substances for their harmful effects. How quickly does the FDA process act on new substances? These new creations, or designer type drugs, will be on the street and will be used, with the black market being the source. The creation of "Ice", a smokeable form of crystal methamphetamine, is a perfect example of the ingenuity of the drug traffickers. Ice will become the problem of the early 1990's. It will, in all likelihood, replace crack cocaine because of the physical effects, as well as the lower price. Especially because of its domestic production capabilities.

The Elkhart County Drug Task Force has been an entity since mid to late 1986. In the spring of 1986, Det. Neil Graves of the Indiana State Police and Det. Tom Dewitt of the Elkhart Police Department, were interviewed by the Elkhart Truth. They had the following observations:

51 of 139 arrests by the Elkhart City Police were for cocaine.

Undercover officers purchased or seized $18,340.00 worth of cocaine in that period.

Indiana State Police intelligence indicated that there were a dozen major dealers operating in Elkhart County.

Their distribution network involved around 150-200 street dealers.

Dewitt estimated that there were 1-3 major dealers operating in the city.

At the time, these numbers were astounding and received front page coverage. With these numbers in mind, the numbers for 1989 should scare the citizens of Elkhart County, to death:

136 cocaine delivery cases investigated by the Drug Task Force. (This does not include arrests for possession of cocaine by the law enforcement agencies in Elkhart County).

Undercover officers purchased and/or seized 1724.57 grams of cocaine, with an estimated potential street value (according to the DEA formula) $1,379,656.00.

The Drug Task Force arrested 11 Level I dealers (persons who deal in kilos of cocaine and have distinct organizations working as distributors).

Approximately 500 persons have been identified that distribute cocaine. (At one level or another).

These figures are representative of cocaine and do not include other drugs such as marijuana, crystal methamphetamine (crank), and other illegal drugs.

These numbers have been generated with less manpower. The officers of the Elkhart County Drug Task Force are on call 7 days a week, 365 days a year. The Task Force personnel have worked approximately 2000 hours of overtime in the calendar year 1989. There were numerous occasions during a shift when officers were not able to take a break or stop for a meal during a 14-16 hour shift.

The officers assigned to the Elkhart County Drug Task Force are extremely dedicated to the performance of their duties, and have operated extremely well again, in 1989. A major asset of the Elkart County Drug Task Force is a civilian administrative assistant, who handles all incoming intelligence calls, and also maintains our intelligence files, types the reports, and assists the officers in the performance of their duties.

Some of the highlights during the course of 1989 were the investigation, and ultimate arrests, of 11 Level I drug dealers. A level I defendant is one that can deliver as much as a kilogram (2.2 pounds) of cocaine or crystal methamphetamine, or 50 pounds of marijuana. This person would also have a minimum of 5 persons working in a distribution network. Of these eleven persons designated as Level I dealers, three of these were females. Females at this level are a departure from our past investigative experience.

Also during 1989 an individual that had been a target of the Drug Task Force for approximately two years, pled guilty to cocaine delivery charges and received a 20 year sentence. With time served in the county jail and time off for good behavior, he will be released in about 9 years.

Two other persons that were brought to justice during 1989, were two brothers that held a member of the Drug Task Force at gunpoint and threatened to murder him, merely because he was a police officer. A trial was held during 1989 and these subjects were ultimately found guilty and were sentenced, one for 18 years, the other for 30 years.

The Elkart County Drug Task Force has continued to maintain its good working relationship with the South Bend Federal Drug Task Force, and other law enforcement agencies not only in this area, but in areas throughout the country. The credibility of the Elkart County Drug Task Force is very high. We feel we have earned the respect of our peers. At the end of 1989, Assistant U.S. Attorney Rick Jancha transferred to the Orlando, FL U.S. Attorney's Office. Mr. Jancha had been assigned to the South Bend Federal Drug Task Force, and had been a great asset to the Elkhart County Drug Task Force. He assisted us on a number of investigations, and was a good resource for us.

In 1989, we have seen an additional commitment by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms to dealing with the narcotics problem throughout the nation. On a local level, we have established a good working relationship with agents of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms.

We have also maintained throughout 1989, our extremely high conviction rate. It is felt this high conviction rate is due to our good working relationship with the Elkhart County Prosecutor's Office, as well as the thoroughness of our investigations.

As the Elkhart County Drug Task Force prepares to enter the next decade, we feel we are prepared to face the new challenges that are ahead. The personnel are dedicated to continue to deal with this problem with whatever resources are provided to us.

While we have had great success in developing cases on targeted individuals and organizations, we know that the effort must continue. We hope that the strong support from the citizens of Elkhart County will continue. This support is what enables the individuals of the Task Force to continue, in the face of such overwhelming odds.

Some things challenging us in the 1990's are the continued influx of out of town groups entering our jurisdiction for the purpose of uniting and setting up drug distribution networks. We have seen this occur twice in 1989, one group from southern Missouri (this organization was infiltrated and taken apart with the arrest of a large number of persons in October 1989). A second organization appears to be gaining influence, and this influence has been felt within our community. Only time will tell with this group as to how entrenched they will become, due to recent activities they have been involved in. This organization is still under investigation.

The influx of street gang type activity is a sign of many problems to follow. Such as; increased violence, crack cocaine, turf battles, and increased attacks on law enforcement personnel. A drug related homicide during the year 1989, and a second homicide that is presently under investigation, are indicators that these types of activities need to be dealt with firmly and forcefully.

The solutions involve education, awareness, and strict law enforcement. Only a combination of all three, along with a complete and total commitment by all political entities, all law enforcement agencies, the criminal justice system, as well as the citizens, will even begin to address the problem. This community has a great deal going for it. With all resources brought together, we have the opportunity to deal with this problem and deal with it in a positive way.

No year end report of the activities of the Elkhart County Drug Task Force would be complete without the recognition of the Elkhart County Fight Crime Fund. Approximately $55,000.00 of funds processed through the Fight Crime Fund, have been utilized by the Drug Task Force. This support has made possible all we have accomplished. This support and dedication are what make our efforts unique. We, the members of the Elkhart County Drug Task Force, greatly appreciate their efforts.

And so, I commend the vigilance of the Elkhart County Drug Task Force and I want to assure them of my support in the fight to eradicate drugs from our society. In this regard, I supported an increase of 91 percent in 1990 funding for local justice assistance. I am pleased that the fiscal year 1991 budget submitted by President Bush includes almost $500 million for State and local law enforcement—an increase of over 228 percent over the last 2 years.

In their report, the task force has outlined several concerns, such as prisons packed to capacity, which echo those of other antidrug forces. I ask my colleagues to join me in seeking solutions to these problems, including alternative methods of incarceration, such as "boot camps," to alleviate prison overcrowding. It is my hope that Congress will be able to take the necessary steps to assure that there is ample room in our jails to accommodate each and every convicted drug felon.

The tireless efforts of the members of the Elkhart County Drug Task Force are deeply appreciated, and their work is indeed helping to reclaim our society from the scourge of drugs. I wish them much success over the next year in their fight to eradicate drugs from our streets, our schools, and our neighborhoods.●

IN HONOR OF DR. KENNETH JENNINGS

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I rise today to honor a Minnesotan whose talent has been enjoyed and cherished in Minnesota and throughout the world.

After 37 years of serving on the faculty of St. Olaf College, and 22 years serving as the college's choir director, Dr. Kenneth Jennings conducted his last performance last Sunday at the Kennedy Center in Washington.

Dr. Jennings is both an artist and a teacher. Under his leadership, the St. Olaf Choir has set the highest standards of artistry in choral singing. Jennings' innovative programming and use of concerted works have expanded the repertoire of the choir beyond the a cappella traditions of its early years.

His interest in pedagogical aspects of singing resulted in the publication of a book of vocal exercises for singers, "Sing Legato," which is used today by many schools, universities, and professional ensembles.

Dr. Jennings has enhanced the choir's reputation with six international tours. The choir has performed at the Strasbourg International Music Festival. By invitation, the choir returned to the Strasbourg Festival to perform with the Strasbourg Philharmonic Orchestra. They also performed in Vienna, Rome, Norway, Japan, Taiwan, Hong Kong, and the Peoples Republic of China. As a result of their superb performance they returned to the Orient to participate in the Seoul Olympic Arts Festival in Korea.

The choir's accomplishments do not stop here. They also had the honor of performing with the Minnesota Orchestra under the direction of Stanislaw Skrowaczewski and Neville Marriner.

Mr. President, I ask my colleagues to join me in congratulating Dr. Kenneth Jennings for his distinguished record of accomplishments, and wishing him the best in the years to come. He may be retiring as St. Olaf College's choir director, but he will be remembered through his music and spirit as a distinguished Minnesotan and U.S. citizen.●

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to ask that the following proclamation be printed in its entirety in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I believe that the Ukrainians should celebrate their day of independence. I urge my colleagues to recognize the efforts of all Ukrainians.

The proclamation follows:

COUNTY OF ERIE—PROCLAMATION

Whereas, the past year has brought shafts of light piercing the gloom in a rusting Iron Curtain, clearly revealing the total failure of Communism, one maxim ought to be remembered the tena-city in holding onto its monopoly of power; and

Whereas, the ominous conditions of the past seven decades have buckled under the weight of the bedrock of human drive for dignity of every nation and every individual; and

Whereas, the events in Eastern Central Europe have electrified mankind to the specter of the massive outrage against the accumulated atrocities instigated or enforced by the bankrupt Russian Communist occupations; and

Whereas, the principle of national independence and sovereign statehood is solemnly guaranteed as an inalienable right by numerous international agreements and covenants co-signed by the Soviet Union; and

Whereas, the Ukrainian Nations have declared in 1918 and reaffirmed in 1919 their firm resolve to lead an independent sovereign existence which was subsequently brutally crushed by the military might driven by Russian colonial expansionism; and

Whereas, Gorbachev's proclaimed "Glasnost and Perestroika" has not envisioned full national independence for Ukraine, the Baltic States and other subjugated nations notwithstanding that cessation is guaranteed by the Soviet constitution; and

Whereas, the world cannot indefinitely remain half free and half enslaved as history has proven repeatedly, it behooves free people everywhere to support the legitimate process of regaining freedom and independence to all Captive Nations;

Now, therefore, I, Dennis T. Gorski, Erie County Executive, do hereby proclaim Monday, January 22, 1990, as "Ukrainian Independence Day" in this majestic County of Erie, of the State of New York—The Empire State. I urge all my fellow citizens to given renewed devotion to the just cause and aspirations of the people of Ukraine who seek to regain national independence and individual liberty.●

CHILD SURVIVAL

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues an article on the importance of child survival which appeared on January 25, 1990, in the Honolulu Star-Bulletin. Children are our world's most important resource. This article brings their plight in many nations to our attention. I hereby request that this article be placed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Honolulu Star-Bulletin, Jan. 25, 1990]

LET'S RAISE OUR VOICES ABOUT POVERTY AND HUNGER

Total global military spending and payment on world debt exceeds the total income of the poorest half of humanity. While expenditures are made on weaponry and debt, one quarter of a million babies and young children die every week of malnutrition and preventable disease. After decades of progress, countries that were showing improvements are now plagued by increasing deaths caused by poverty.

As a whole, developing nations spend half of their expenditures on the military and debt repayment. For our neighbors in Asia and in Latin America and Africa, this equals nearly $1 billion a day. In other words, military and debt payments equal more than $400 a year per family, in countries in which the per capita GNP is often less than that.

The expenditure of less than half of 1 percent of the world's GNP would create a child survival revolution and eliminate the maiming of an equivalent number of children. Although these children survive, they are crippled, blinded and mentally and physically retarded.

Some would argue that these deaths are "natural" population control. I assert that in an age in which we have the means to prevent unwanted births, these deaths by starvation, thirst and agonizing, preventable disease are unnatural and intolerable.

Extensive studies conducted by UNICEF have shown that when people believe their children will live, they are willing to have fewer children.

Our global spending policies are creating what UNICEF has termed "passive atrocities." These victims of atrocity are not easy to see because most look "normal." The camera lens does not recognize the child going blind from the lack of 2-cents worth of vitamin A, a condition that untreated will eventually cause other problems leading to death. No photograph or casual viewer, will recognize the apparently normal 3 year old, who is actually 5.

I am driven by the image of a child who is genetically normal and not outwardly diseased. This 5 year old had just learned to walk because he was so retarded in his development by chronic malnutrition.

As an international airline purser for 13 years, no doubt I passed his brethren by on many foreign streets not realizing what I saw. It is easy to miss. Even the parents of these children do not realize their problems. In their communities, this is the norm.

If you fully take in the thought of what that norm implies, it is excruciating. Most people therefore, turn a blind eye. Some of us are incapable of living with ourselves if we do that.

Actress Audrey Hepburn was recently asked on "60 Minutes," why she was willing to travel to the feeding/death camps and serve as an honorary ambassador for UNICEF. Her reply, that she does so to keep her sanity, speaks for those who cannot blind themselves.

Her choice is that of determining that you can and will make a difference. The National Academy of Science states, ". . . if there is the political will . . . it should be possible to overcome the worst aspects of widespread hunger and malnutrition in one generation."

Political will is no more or no less than your own individual will collectively asserted. Consider Illinois Sen. Paul Simon's statement: "Someone who sits down and writes a letter about hunger . . . almost literally has to be saving a life."

Writing our politicians is a good entry point into creating change. Support groups, such as RESULTS and Bread for the World, can provide you with information to make your letters informed and effective.

Other actions you can take are: positioning your investments in social responsibility funds, getting a free UNICEF Visa Card, and supporting hunger organizations with volunteer help and funding.

Each of us, whether a Kaneohe homemaker like me, or a Gorbachev, or a Bush is only one person. What we do defines our life. What we do collectively defines our society and the meaning of humanity. We must include protecting the lives of children in that definition. UNICEF has summoned us to do so by calling for a World Summit for Children and by the U.N. General Assembly passing the Convention on the Rights of the Child.

The summit's purpose is to set global goals for the survival, protection and nurturing of children. It is recognized that saving children's lives to sentence them to live in conditions of hellish poverty, ignorance and illness is inappropriate.

The Convention on the Rights of the Child therefore begins with protecting children from abduction, sale, sexual exploitation and abuse. It includes their right to a name, nationality, and ethnic expression and seeks to prevent hazardous employment that interferes with their development and education. This includes their participation in the sale and manufacture of drugs.

Finally, it affirms their right to health, education and play.

What does it say about our definition of ourselves as human, when we have created conditions in which we must seek to legitimize a child's right to live and play?

As we enter the 1990s, "humanity" passively allows a holocaust without a flame to continue. We must choose to redefine what being human means.

(Karen Mituro, a Kaneohe resident, is the Hawaii state coordinator for RESULTS, a volunteer citizen's lobby to end hunger.)●

THE U.S. INVESTMENT IN EDUCATION IN INTERNATIONAL PERSPECTIVE

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, in opposing increases in the education budget, the administration often claims that the United States spends more on education than most other industrialized nations. However, a recent report by M. Edith Rasell and Lawrence Mishel of the Economic Policy Institute came to the opposite conclusion. When considering how much countries spend on elementary and secondary education alone, the United States ranks near the bottom. When higher education is included in the calculation, the United States is near the top. It is not unreasonable to conclude that we have the best universities in the world partly because of the investment we have made in them. Likewise, it is not unreasonable to conclude that some of our problems in elementary and secondary education are related to a lack of financial commitment.

But while these kinds of comparisons are interesting, the arguments about them are not very productive. We must move beyond the discussions of the appropriate methodologies for comparing our educational inputs or outputs with other nations. The question should not be "Who is better than whom?" but instead, "How can we be better than we are?"

If we find that elementary school teachers do not know enough about math and science, we must invest in training them. If we believe that poor children need educational enrichment activities before they start school, we must pay people to run those programs. If the best and the brightest students are not going into teaching because of low salaries, we need to increase salaries.

Yes, extra money haphazardly thrown at a bad school will be wasted. But money invested in effective programs, geared toward real needs, will reap huge dividends. The longer we delay, the more we risk completely missing this investment opportunity. The dividends—the economic and intellectual productivity of millions of Americans—will be lost to educational neglect.

Mr. President, I would ask that the Washington Post essay by M. Edith Rasell and Lawrence Mishel be inserted into the RECORD.

The essay follows:

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 14, 1990]

IS AMERICA STRANGLING ITS SCHOOLS?

(By M. Edith Rasell and Lawrence Mishel)

In the State of the Union address last week, President Bush—who wants to be known as "the education president"—committed America's high schools to a 90-percent graduation rate and our students to becoming "first in the world in math and science achievement" by the year 2000. He pledged that "this nation will not accept anything less than excellence in education." That goal, he added, "is not simply a matter of spending more. It is a matter of asking more." And in fact Bush's budget would increase federal spending for elementary, secondary and vocational education by less than 2 percent—half the expected rate of inflation.

The administration's position on educational spending is well known. At the education summit last September, Bush declared that the United States "lavishes unsurpassed resources on [our children's] schooling," and that "our focus must no longer be on resources. It must be on results." At the same conference, Secretary of Education Lauro Cavazos said that "funding is truly not an issue."

The administration has justified this stance by asserting that our education system is already well-funded in comparison with other industrialized nations, by either of two measures. One is spending per pupil. According to Cavazos, "we are already spending more money per student than our major foreign competitors, Japan and Germany." The chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, Michael J. Boskin, agrees: "[w]e spend more, per pupil, than most of the other major industrialized economies."

The second measure is the share of national income devoted to education—a "very large amount," according to Boskin. Roger Porter, the White House domestic policy adviser, says that compared with other countries, U.S. spending on education is "more per capita, more per student—it is more as a share of our gross national product. We spend one and a half percent of GNP more than the Japanese."

The claim that American education is well-funded, and that therefore poor student performance cannot be a matter of insufficient monies, is a key element in the national debate. Our recent research—which examines total U.S. education spending at the federal, state and local levels plus all private funding—shows that such assertions are misleading. In fact:

U.S. public and private spending on preprimary, primary and secondary education (the focus of national concern) is lower than in most other countries. The U.S. ties for 12th place among 16 industrialized nations, spending less than all but three.

When expenditures for grades K-12 are further adjusted to reflect differences in enrollment rates, the United States falls to 14th place, spending less than all the other countries but two.

When U.S. public spending alone is compared with public spending abroad, we rank 14th for all levels of schooling, 14th in spending on K-12, and 13th in K-12 spending adjusted for enrollment.

If we were to increase spending for primary and secondary school up to the average level found in the other 15 countries in 1985, we would need to raise spending by some $25 billion annually.

Because we spend comparatively more than other countries on higher education, when expenditures on all levels of education are calculated, we are in a three-way tie for second place among the countries studied.

Money, of course, does not guarantee excellence. It is likely that other changes—in curriculum, status of teachers and expectations about students, among various innovations—will also be required. But to begin a process of reform by denying the need to increase spending, especially when U.S. schools are underfunded compared with other industrialized countries, places a severely limiting constraint on any plans for improvement.

HOW MUCH OF OUR WEALTH?

Let us first compare education expenditures as a percentage of national income (the sum of all wages, salaries, profits, interest and rents). Commonly employed in international comparisons, this method avoids distortions caused by fluctuating currency-exchange rates and provides a measure of the national effort each country gives to education. This is the standard method used for international comparisons by the U.S. government, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) and the World Bank.

A cursory look at these figures shows that U.S. spending on all levels of schooling—including pre-school, primary, secondary and higher education—amounted to 6.8 percent of national income in 1985, putting us in a three-way tie for second place among the 16 developed countries studied. By this measure it appears that only Sweden spends a larger share of national income on education; Canada and the Netherlands spend equivalent amounts.

This comparatively high expenditure is largely due to the substantial sums America spends on higher education. A relatively larger number of U.S. students are enrolled in some form of post-secondary education than in most other countries: 5.1 percent of the entire U.S. population in 1985—two to three times greater than the percentage enrollments of any other country except Canada. But our crisis is not in higher education; it is in the primary and secondary systems. And if spending on K-12 only is compared, in 1985 the United States tied for 12th place, spending less than 11 of the other countries.

But the picture is still incomplete. Calculations of funding adequacy must also be related to the size of the school-age population in each country. Among the countries studied, the U.S. enrolls more than 19 percent of the population in K-12, a relatively large percentage compared with West Germany (15 percent) or Switzerland (14). By this more accurate measure, among the 16 countries studied, the United States spends less than all but two other countries: Australia and Ireland.

We can also compare U.S. education spending as a share of national income with the average share of the other 15 countries. We spent 4.1 percent of our national income on K-12 education in 1985, while the average abroad was 4.6 percent. To reach this average in 1985, we would have needed to raise K-12 spending by over 12 percent or $20.6 billion annually ($25 billion in 1989 dollars).

Clearly, America spends a smaller share of its national resources on K-12 than most other industrialized countries. But what about public expenditures?

For most of the 16 countries studied, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) assembles data on public expenditures for education because public revenue provide virtually all of the money spent. The two exceptions are Japan and the United States, where 20-25 percent of all education funding comes from private sources. For these two countries, UNESCO provides data on public and private education expenditures.

Spending on public education reflects the conscious national commitment to educating the next generation. It is therefore useful to compare levels of public spending here and in Japan with public spending in the other 14 countries. Comparing public spending for all levels of education—including post-secondary—the United States is in 14th place. We rank 13th in spending for K-12 only, adjusted for enrollments.

HOW MUCH PER STUDENT?

Education investment can also be analyzed by comparing expenditures per pupil. This is the measure Cavazos and Boskin have sometimes used to claim that we are spending more on education than our economic competitors.

However, there are two potential sources of error in the use of per-pupil expenditures to compare nations' spending on education. The first is the instability of exchange rates. Before cross-national comparisons can be made, expenditures measured in each country's national currency must be expressed in some common unit of measurement, e.g. dollars, yen, marks, etc. But whatever measure one chooses, it requires converting data collected in all other currencies to one currency. However, exchange rates fluctuate, sometimes markedly, and this has been particularly true in the 1980s.

For instance, in 1985, if $100,000 would have purchased a German school bus, by 1988, due to a decline in the value of the dollar, the same bus would have cost $166,000. If exchange rates were used to convert German expenditures into dollars, the purchase of the bus by a German school district in 1985 would have been shown as an expenditure of $100,000, while the same purchase in 1988 would appear as an expenditure of $166,000. The size of the German expenditure measured in German marks would be unchanged, but fluctuations in the exchange rate used to convert marks to dollars would markedly change the dollar value of the expenditure. In 1985, the year which we have been examining, the dollar was particularly overvalued. The effect is to make the U.S. expenditures on education appear relatively greater than those in other countries.

The second problem is that per-pupil expenditures do not tell us what can actually be purchased. This depends on prices. One country may spend more per student; but because costs are higher, the outlay may simply buy less than a smaller expenditure in a country with lower prices. (Note that comparing expenditures as a percentage of national income does take costs into account because costs are generally proportional to national-income levels.)

This can be illustrated by looking at expenditures in two U.S. states. In 1986, Alaska spent more than $11,500 per student—202 percent of the U.S. average. But in Alaska, salaries of instructional staff were 166 percent of the national level. Adjusted for those higher costs, Alaska's spending was actually 122 percent of the national per-pupil average. At the other extreme is Arkansas, where per-student expenditures were just 76 percent of the national average in '86. But after adjusting for salaries that were only 74 percent of average, Arkansas' per-pupil spending was actually 103 percent of the nationwide norm. Thus a comparison based simply on raw dollar amounts would overstate Alakska's position and understate Arkansas'.

In sum, per-pupil expenditures can be used to make valid international comparisons if two conditions are met: exchange rates are avoided; and some measure of national income (or price level) is factored in. Expenditures per student can accurately be expressed as a percentage of per-capita income measured in each nation's own currency—a method also used by the OECD. Calculated that way, U.S. spending on K-12 education is lower than all but two other countries of the 16 studied.

Another significant criterion for the strength of U.S. educational investment is how funding has changed over time—and how it has varied relative to spending by other countries.

When expressed as a percentage of national income, U.S. spending for pre-primary, primary and secondary education peaked in 1974, and has fallen steadily since. Thus our spending for education has not kept pace with overall economic growth.

On the other hand, over this same period enrollments fell. Primary and secondary school enrollment, as a percentage of the total population, was at its highest level in 1969, and has been gradually declining since then—at a rate that more than offsets the decreases in spending. In the 1980s, the declining fraction of the population enrolled in school has meant adjusted expenditures have risen, despite the slowdown in actual funding for education. Nonetheless, the 1980-86 rate was only one-third that of the '70s, during which per-pupil K-12 spending grew at an annual, inflation-adjusted rate of 3 percent.

Meanwhile, the past decade saw proportionally more of the funding burden shift from the federal government to states and localities. From 1980-85, federal spending for K-12 (adjusted for enrollments and expressed as a share of national income), declined by 24 percent. This reduction, however, has been more than offset by increases in state and local funding, leading to a net rise in K-12 expenditures during the '80s. But despite the greater outlays, our position relative to other countries declined.

Examining K-12 expenditures in 1980 and 1985 for the 16 countries, with both years' expenditures adjusted for the 1985 U.S. enrollment rate, shows that in 1980 the United States ranked 12th in adjusted spending on K-12. By 1985, we had fallen to 14th. (Between 1985 and '87, public expenditures on K-12—expressed as a percentage of national income and adjusted for 1985 enrollments—rose. Since then, the level has remained relatively constant at around 4.2 percent. Because comparable international data are not available, we cannot determine how this post-1985 U.S. trend affects our relative ranking with other countries.)

PAYING THE PRICE

Clearly, the claim that the U.S. spends more than other nations on education is misleading. By all comparisons, we devote a smaller share of our resources to pre-primary, primary and secondary education than do most industrialized countries.

Spending more money is not, of course, the only answer to the difficult problem of revitalizing American primary and secondary education. But in education, as in virtually every other service, we may "get what we pay for." Given the level of investment in our pre-primary, primary, and secondary schools, it is not surprising that America is slipping behind in comparative measures of performance as well.

WHY NOT THE REST?

The relatively weak U.S. educational investment in grades K-12, compared with other countries, is not a result of a more efficient administrative structure or more favorable demographics. In fact, we might be expected to spend proportionally more than other countries because of the particular characteristics of the U.S. school system and American society.

Our decentralized school system gives more local autonomy and local choice, but is also more expensive than a single, centrally administered system. Our population is also much more heterogeneous than that of most other countries. Some immigrants do not speak English. Students come from a variety of cultural backgrounds. The very high number of children living in poverty makes additional demands on the school system.

Available data do not permit cross-country comparisons to be made in much more detail, but other evidence suggests that the spending gap is particularly wide between the youngest American and foreign children. For example, it is generally accepted that the U.S. Head Start program of early childhood education for disadvantaged children ages 3 to 5 is valuable and cost-effective. Yet limited federal funding permits only 20 percent of eligible children to take part.

Many of our competitors seem to have a stronger commitment to early childhood education, and some of them have nearly universal pre-kindergarten enrollments. In France, 100 percent of 4- and 5-year-olds attend school/educational day care, as do 90 percent of 3-year-olds and 36 percent of 2-year-olds. In Belgium, 96 percent of ages 3-6 are in school; in the Netherlands, 98 percent of 4- and 5-year-olds.—M. Edith Rasell and Lawrence Mishel.●

ACID RAIN

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, this September, if all goes according to schedule, the National Acid Precipitation Assessment Program will submit to Congress its final report on the causes and effects of what we call "acid rain." Ten years and a half-a-billion dollars in the making, this report, when published, will conclude the most extensive—and—expensive—environmental research project ever performed.

In preparation for the final report, some 700 scientists gathered in Hilton Head, SC, last week to discuss the meaning of the extensive data gathered under NAPAP. By all accounts, the debate at Hilton Head was lively. Not least because NAPAP has found that acid deposition, while certainly an important concern, is not the crisis we suspected 10 years ago. It is an environmental problem, but it is neither our worst nor our most pressing one. This point is made quite well in an article by William K. Stevens that appears in today's New York Times.

Mr. President, that many issues were left unresolved at last week's conference is indicative of the great need to continue NAPAP beyond its original 10-year mandate. We have before us a clean air bill that would impose strong—and costly—acid rain controls. It is both fiscally and scientifically prudent to continue NAPAP's research into acid rain and the results of our control efforts. Doing so is the only way to enable us to know just what we are getting from our efforts. And that is why I have offered, and S. 1630, the Clean Air Act Amendments, contains a provision to do just that.

Mr. President, I ask that a copy of the New York Times article be inserted in the RECORD immediately following my remarks. I thank the Chair.

The article follows:

WORST FEARS ON ACID RAIN UNREALIZED

(By William K. Stevens)

HILTON HEAD, SC.—A 10-year, half-billion-dollar federally sponsored investigation is concluding that acid rain causes some significant environmental damage but far less than initially feared.

"The sky is not falling, but there is a problem that needs addressing," James R. Mahoney, the director of the National Acid Precipitation Program, said as about 700 scientists from more than 30 countries gathered here last week to digest, pick apart and argue about the results of hundreds of studies that will form the basis for the program's final report to Congress later this year.

"Acid rain does cause damage," Dr. Mahoney said, "but the amount of damage is less than we once thought, and it's much less than some of the characterizations we sometimes hear."

Some of the program's findings are riddled with uncertainty. Some scientists at the Hilton Head review, moreover, criticized the assessment as prematurely concluding that acid rain is causing little harm to American forests. And Canadian scientists charged that the assessment understated the problem in their country, a problem to which, it is generally agreed, the United States greatly contributes.

But Dr. Mahoney said that while there is "a great deal of room, still, for debate and interpretation," the extremes of the debate—the view that acid rain represented an imminent environmental disaster and the opposite view that it was not a problem—have now been eliminated.

The Federal research program, created by Congress in 1980 to provide the Government with a definitive study of acid rain, has engaged the efforts of hundreds of scientists. Last week's meeting was meant to be the last major critical scientific review of the findings, among them these major ones:

In the United States, fewer than 1,200 lakes have become fully acidified. Little can live in them, and acid rain is mostly responsible. This is about 4 percent of all lakes in areas where acidification might be expected. Earlier, it has been feared that thousands of lakes would be fully acidified by now. In the Northest, where most of the concern has focused, those lakes that are going to become acidified have already done so. An additional .5 percent of American lakes on which acid is thought to fall, while not necessarily fully acidified, are acidic enough to threaten some species of aquatic life.

Except for red spruce at high elevations in the Eastern mountains, there is no evidence that acid rain has caused a general decline of American forests. But a sizable minority of scientists at Hilton Head argued that because this part of the research effort is relatively young, and because new, provocative but unevaluated data are still coming in, the door was being closed too soon. Furthermore, they argued, the report on forests had given short shrift to the possibility that over the long term, acid rain causes nutritional deficiencies in trees by altering soil chemistry.

There is no evidence that acid rain in the United States harms corps.

Acid rain and dry acid particles in the atmosphere could pose a health risk to asthmatics, people with heart or lung disease, children and the elderly, either alone or in concert with other pollutants such as ozone. Symptoms include wheezing, shortness of breath and coughing. But, citing uncertainty surrounding the issue, the study report said the health risk was speculative at this time. The study found also that acidic deposition might cause the chemical release in the environment of enough lead to affect health. The level of risk, if any, is not yet determined.

In the Eastern United States, sulfates of the kind borne by acid rain are the dominant cause of haze and reduced visibility, accounting for half the degradation of light. Sulfur emissions have been the major contributor to Eastern haze since the late 1940's.

Acid rain damages such construction materials as marble and limestone and causes a number of metals and alloys to corrode more rapidly. At particular risk are an estimated 35,000 historic buildings and 10,000 monuments in the Northeast.

DEBATE IN CONGRESS

Congress is debating proposed amendments to the Clean Air Act. Acid rain is one target of legislation, introduced by the Bush Administration, to amend the law. Industries, electric utilities in particular, would be required to reduce emissions of sulfur dioxide and oxides of nitrogen by 10 million tons and 2 million tons a year, respectively, by the year 2000, at a cost estimated by the Environmental Protection Agency as $22 billion over the next decade.

Sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxides, produced by the burning of coal, oil and natural gas, are the precursors of acid rain. In the atmosphere, they react with water and other chemicals to form sulfate and nitrate compounds that can be carried hundreds of miles by air currents before they are deposited on the earth by rain, snow, sleet, mist, fog or clouds. Dry sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxides also sometimes fall to earth nearer the point of origin.

In broad perspective, say Dr. Mahoney and some others associated with the Federal study, acid rain cannot be seen as ranking at, or even near, the top of a present-day priority list of environmental issues that also includes urban air pollution, destruction of tropical forests, depletion of the earth's protective ozone layer and the possibility of global climate change.

"I completely disagree with that," Deborah A. Sheiman of the Natural Resources Defense Council, an environmental advocacy group, said as the conference was ending. Not least, she and others said, this is because in one respect, there are more reasons, not fewer, to be concerned about acid rain today than there were 10 years ago. Then, the concern focused on damage to lakes and streams in the Northeast. Now it involves lakes and streams in other regions as well, along with forests, human health, atmospheric visibility and damage to materials.

Ten years ago, Dr. Mahoney recalled, some environmentalists predicted that within a decade, acid rain would increase by tenfold the acidity of thousands of lakes in the United States. In fact, the research shows, the acidity actually increases by up to fivefold over 20 to 50 years, and far fewer lakes are involved. (Tenfold is equal to one point on the 14-point pH scale, which is the standard measure of acidity and alakinity. A pH of zero is totally acid; of 14, totally alkaline. Seven is neutral.) Damage to aquatic life begins to take place below a pH of 6, according to findings presented at Hilton Head. The Federal study found that 9 percent of lakes in areas of the United States known to be targets for acid rain had acid levels below pH 6, and that 4 percent were totally acidified. These lakes, though a small fraction of the national total, were concentrated not only in the Northeast, as had long been suspected, but also in Appalachia, on the mid-Atlantic coastal plain, in northern Florida and in contiguous parts of northern Wisconsin and the Upper Peninsula of Michigan.

The survey also found that 2.7 percent of streams in areas where acid rain falls from the sky were acidic, and that many streams in the Appalachians were vulnerable to future acidification.

"I'm not saying there's no problem," said Dr. Mahoney. "But we don't have very rapid decay of large numbers of lakes." While many lakes will recover once no more acid falls into them, he said, the recovery will take some years.

QUESTIONS ABOUT CANADA

The Federal study incorporates data from Canada showing that 5 percent of a sample fo 8,500 Canadian lakes were acidified. If that is an accurate sample of the whole, it would mean that perhaps 14,000 Canadian lakes are fully acid. And about a quarter of the Canadian lakes sampled had a pH of 6 or less. Canadian scientists say that perhaps 150,000 lakes could fall in this category.

By treating these findings separately, burying them in the body of the study, leaving them out of the summary and generally underplaying them, the scientists "greatly diminished" the extent of the Canadian problem, contended Tom Brydges, a lakes expert from Environment Canada, his country's environmental agency.

Lawrence Baker of the University of Minnesota Water Resources Center, who was the chief author of the lakes report, said that ideally, the Canadian data should be integrated with the overall study. But he said it was unclear whether the Canadian sample was a true random sampling of Canadian lakes. Further, he said, the two studies did not examine the same variables.

"I'm not exactly sure if it can be resolved, scientifically speaking," he said.

The Canadian objection is being taken seriously, said Patricia Irving, the associate director of the Federal study and its science coordinator.

A major purpose of the Hilton Head meeting, she said, was to uncover and ventilate just such concerns before the final report.

At the levels at which acid is now being deposited in North America, the study found that with the exception of Eastern red spruce at high elevations, there is "no evidence of widespread forest damage." Moreover, it found that acid rain "is not associated with crop damage." The real villain, it found, is ozone, which "is capable of regional-scale crop growth and yield reduction" and is "the pollutant of greatest concern" with respect to forests.

Beyond that, the reports on forests and vegetation generated considerable contention.

There is wide agreement that to the extent acid rain does harm forests, it is just one of many stresses, including natural ones such as drought and cold. Scientists say it is extremely difficult to sort out cause and effect. Moreover, critics at Hilton Head said that data collection on forests was still going on and not that much information was in hand.

The study was also criticized for drawing a sweeping conclusion that hardwoods like the sugar maple are not harmed by acid rain. Some studies in Canada suggest the opposite, and critics said that the door should not be closed just yet.

And in one of the biggest reservations on the forest issue, a number of scientists said that there was much evidence that acid rain changes the balance of nutrients in forest soils. Some scientists, in fact, are convinced that there is no doubt that acid in some soils not only robs the soil of nutrients but also interferes with the ability of trees to absorb them. Some members of the forestry study group said that this would have to be reevaluated, and that new information might have to be sought, before a final report is issued.●

AMERICAN CHOCOLATE WEEK

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, the week of March 12, 1990, has been designated by the chocolate industry as "American Chocolate Week." Americans love chocolate. According to an October 1989 Gallup poll, chocolate is American's favorite flavor.

New Jersey is the proud home of famous chocolate makers, large and small, from Van Leer Chocolate Corp. and M&M/Mars, to the many independent small chocolate candymakers who have passed down their epicurean secrets for generations. This week is also a tribute to them and their hard work over the years.

Until the discovery of America in 1492, the Old World knew nothing about this delicious flavor that was to become the favorite of millions. When Columbus returned to the Court of King Ferdinand, he brought back many unique things. Among them were dark brown beans; cacao beans, the source of all chocolate and cocoa.

But it was not until the Spanish explorer Cortez' conquest of Mexico that the commercial possibilities of this strange bean became known.

Cortez found the Aztecs using cacao beans to prepare a royal drink called chocolatl which Emperor Montezuma served to his Spanish guests in golden goblets. But the chocolatl was too bitter for the Spanish taste. To make it more agreeable to Europeans, Cortez and his countrymen sweetened it with cane sugar. When they took the chocolate back to Spain, the drink underwent several more changes that helped to popularize it. Someone added cinnamon, another a dash of vanilla and another decided it would taste better served hot.

The new drink became especially popular among the Spanish aristocracy and Spain proceeded to plant cacao in its overseas possessions. It became a profitable business, but the Spaniards kept the art of the cacao industry a secret from the rest of Europe for nearly 100 years.

After the secret was leaked out by Spanish monks, chocolate was acclaimed throughout Europe as a delicious, healthy food. Chocolate drinking became fashionable in the French Court and in Great Britain. Mass production was hastened by a steam machine which handled the cacao grinding process. By 1730, chocolate dropped in price from $3 or more a pound to within the reach of others besides the wealthy. The invention of the cacao press in 1828 cut prices further and improved the quality of the beverage.

In the 19th century, there were two significant developments in the history of chocolate. In Switzerland in 1876, Daniel Peter invented a way of making milk chocolate for eating. The second development was of a smooth variety called fondant chocolate which almost completely replaced the coarse grained chocolate which had dominated the world chocolate market.

Chocolate has a long history in America. The first U.S. chocolate factory was established in New England in 1765, and Americans have been enjoying this good-tasting food ever since. During World War II, chocolate played a vital role in the nourishment of the Allied Armed Forces. Valuable shipping space was allocated for the importation of cacao beans.

Today, the love of chocolate continues. In fact, in 1989, the average annual U.S. consumption of chocolate was 11 pounds per person. The chocolate industry in the United States is nearly a $6 billion industry wholesale which is about $9 billion retail.

During the first annual American Chocolate Week, chocolate lovers around the country plan to celebrate their favorite flavor. To kick off the celebration there will even be a chocolate lover's press conference brunch in the House of Representatives.

I pay tribute to all the chocolate makers in my State. I hope chocolate lovers across the United States will join in this festive celebration.●

GEOGRAPHY AWARENESS

● Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, America has finally recognized the enormous task it faces in raising the level of geographic knowledge among American students and adults. Leaders in both government and the private sector have begun to take steps to reverse this downward trend in our Nation's geographic literacy.

Evidence of the need for geography education in the United States was illustrated in a 1988 National Geographic Society/Gallup study. Referencing a world map, only 33 percent of adult Americans could locate Vietnam, 19 percent Colombia, and 11 percent Romania. Just 15 percent knew Mexico City has the largest population in the world, and only 25 percent could name four countries that officially acknowledge having nuclear weapons.

A 1988 survey of State education agencies conducted by the Council of Chief State School Officers shows that although geography is taught in some form at various grade levels in the majority of the States surveyed, only 55 percent have a requirement in geography education.

Some of my distinguished colleagues have already recognized the need for geography education. Senator BRADLEY's and Senator STAFFORD's efforts have resulted in the establishment of Geography Awareness Week. A 1987 hearing before the Subcommittee on Education, Arts, and Humanities, chaired by Senator PELL, explored strategies aimed at increasing geographic literacy. More recently, the education summit in September 1989, sponsored by the White House, called on the Federal, State, and local governments to work together to solve the problems of our educational system.

Mr. President, in a world with shrinking cultural and trade barriers and increased interdependence, a working knowledge of geography and its cultural ramifications is imperative. American corporations have a vested interest in the skills taught in schools: the students of today are the work force of tomorrow. To complete in an increasingly global marketplace, the private sector must make a concerted effort to ensure its future employees are as educated as their foreign counterparts.

One example of private sector involvement in educational programs I would like to recognize today is the American Express Geography Competition, on whose advisory committee I serve. Developed in conjunction with the Association of American Geographers, the competition encourages students to develop projects which require an understanding of geography in its broadest sense—including the study of places on the Earth's surface and of the interrelationships between those places and the people who occupy them. A separate competition requires teachers to submit their most effective methods of teaching geography, and winning entries will be published and circulated to all participants. Awards in the form of travel certificates will encourage both students and teachers to learn more about geography first hand.

The American Express Geography Competition has more than 7,500 students and 550 teacher registrants in its first year. Every State has participated, and submitted entry themes ranging from "What Would Happen if Countries Never Communicated?" to "Rain Forests—What They Do For Us, What We Do To Them."

Although only one example, the competition illustrates how corporations can make unique contributions to education. Private sector involvement, teamed with Federal, State, and local efforts, will put today's students—tommorrow's business leaders—back on the map.●

ANTI-SEMITISM IN THE SOVIET UNION

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I recently requested that my distinguished colleagues join me in sending a letter to President Gorbachev at the end of this week. The letter urges President Gorbachev to make a public statement against rising anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union. Daily we hear reports of attacks, both physical and verbal, being made against Soviet Jews with little or no response from officials in their defense.

To prevent a greater tragedy from occurring, a statement needs to be made by President Gorbachev to show that he has no tolerance for nor does he condone anti-Semitism. This is not, it appears, a novel idea. In Sunday's Washington Post, a supporter of President Gorbachev's who is also a member of the Communist Party in the Soviet Union, stated his concern about the increased incidents and compared the tactics of these anti-Semitic groups to those of the Nazi period. He too mentioned his concern about the silence from the highest Soviet authorities. I would like to submit a copy of that article for the RECORD, and ask that it be printed in full.

I am aware that President Gorbachev has serious domestic concerns, but I believe it is to his advantage to prevent a disaster before it occurs. I encourage my colleagues to join me in sending the letter to President Gorbachev. We need to show our concern and our support for such a statement to be made by President Gorbachev.

The article follows:

ANTI-SEMITISM: THE RETURN OF A RUSSIAN NIGHTMARE

(The following essay represents the sharpest public criticism to date by a senior Soviet official of the growing anti-semitism in the Soviet Union. It was written by Vitalii Goldanskii, a prominent Soviet scientist and director of the Semenov Institute of Chemical Physics of the Soviet Academy of Sciences. Goldanskii is a member of the Council of People's Deputies and the foreign relations committee of the Supreme Soviet. He wrote the following essay in English, with editing assistance from John P. Holdren, a professor of energy and resources at the University of California at Berkeley.)

(By Vitalii I. Goldanskii)

Supporters of President Gorbachev's perestroika are increasingly alarmed by the possibility that this program is restructuring and reforms may collapse. Should this occur—and it cannot be ruled out even in the near future—it would be a disaster not only for the Soviet Union but for all humankind.

Many of the difficulties being encountered by perestroika are well known outside the Soviet Union, as are some of the potential consequences if perestroika fails. But too little attention has been given, until now, to the special dangers posed by the growing aggressiveness in the Soviet Union of extreme right-wing, virulently anti-semitic groups that seek to subvert perestroika, to blame the country's past and present problems on the Jews, and (as some of their propaganda states explicitly) to "finish what Hitler started."

These extremists are flourishing in the climate of spite, envy, scapegoating and hatred associated with the increasingly severe difficulties in the Soviet economy and growing ethnic tensions. They are perhaps already the strongest, and certainly the fastest growing, of the divisive forces pushing the country toward bloodshed and civil war.

The extremist groups go by a variety of innocuous-sounding names, of which the best known outside the Soviet Union is the "National Patriotic Front Pamyal" (pamyat means "memory"). A number of them recently entered into a confederation under the title of "Bloc of Social-Patriotic Movements of Russia." I prefer to call them Russian monarcho-Nazis (or monarcho-fascists), to reflect their combination of deep reverence for the autocratic csarist Russian empire and ferocious hatred of Jews.

Incredibly, the Russian monarcho-Nazis openly and widely condemn the Jews as the main culprits in all of the troubles of Russia from the October Revolution of 1917 up until the present—including genocide against the Russian people in the form of the millions of Russian deaths in civil war, collectivization and various purges; destruction of tens of thousands of Russian churches and historical monuments; and spiritual poisoning of the people through the introduction of decadent and corrupt Western culture alien to Russian tradition. They even accuse the Jews of ritual murders and a worldwide conspiracy against humankind, making references to the disgraceful hoax, "The Protocols of the Elders of Zion."

There is striking similarity, in fact, between the views, programs and intentions of the Russian monarcho-Nazis and the original Nazi platform as laid out in Hitler's "Mein Kampf" and other infamous documents of the German Nazi period. This similarity, and the resemblance of the general situation in the Soviet Union in 1988-90 to that in Germany in 1931-33, have been publicized by progressive Soviet mass media. The newspaper Soviet Circus, for example, has printed a point-by-point comparison of Pamyat's manifesto with the program of the Nazi Party of the 1930s.

The main organization serving as a coordinator of the monarcho-Nazi forces is the Union of Writers of the Russian Federation (RSFSR). As outlets for their propaganda they have at their disposal such newspapers and journals as "Literaturnaya Rossiya" (Literary Russia), "Nash Sovremennik" (Our Contemporary), "Molodaya Gvardija" (Young Guards) and "Moscow." The leaders of this movement include many notorious writers, some scientists, some artists and others.

The Nazi-type speeches and publications of these groups are becoming routine features of everyday life in the Soviet Union. Their form and content were analyzed by Prof. Herman Andreyev from Mainz University in West Germany in a recent issue of the weekly magazine Ogonyok. He concluded that in Western European countries such statements would be treated as unconstitutional, the persons propagating them would be called to account and the organizations supporting them would be dissolved.

Yet the monarcho-Nazis seem to be meeting no serious opposition—indeed, more often sympathy and connivance—from important party and government leaders of the U.S.S.R. It is instructive, for example, that in the platform of the Soviet Communist Party on ethnic problems published in August 1989, not a single word was said about the anti-semitic campaign against so-called cosmopolites (1949), the shooting of leading Jewish writers and artists (1952), or the disgraceful "Doctor's plot" (1953), while many other Stalin-era crimes against various nationalities of the Soviet people were scrupulously mentioned.

Similarly, an appeal by more than 200 people's deputies of the U.S.S.R. to the Presidium of the First Session of the Congress of People's Deputies in June 1989, expressing concern about the "growing wave of anti-semitic activities, including open calls for violence that could lead to irretrievable consequences," went unanswered. That was also the fate of a letter written to Gorbachev on this subject by 10 distinguished scientists and writers in September 1989.

The explanation of such passivity on the part of the authorities seems quite simple. In addition to the evident sympathy of many authorities on different levels to the views of the monarcho-Nazis, others who do not sympathize nonetheless hesitate to act because of the way the growing aggressiveness of the monarcho-Nazis is linked to the bloody ethnic conflicts and intensifying separatist movements in nearly all of the outlying districts of the Soviet Union.

Specifically, this situation offers the monarcho-Nazis considerable opportunities for blackmail and intimidation of Gorbachev and his closest advisers, through the claim that, in conditions of the "decline of empire," the Russian heartland and her "genuine sons" constitute the only reliable basis for the preservation of Gorbachev's power. Such arguments are being used to push Gorbachev toward the right and to divide him from his true supporters on the left—the liberal intelligentsia. The result could be a repetition of the circumstances that produced the downfall of Khrushchev in 1964.

In parallel with their attempts to intimidate Gorbachev, the monarcho-Nazis have been openly attacking his foreign policy. They even have accused Gorbachev of being an agent in the service of the CIA and the Israeli intelligence service, the Mossad. With this two-pronged strategy of intimidation and direct attack, the Russian monarcho-Nazis hope to attain either a decisive influence over Gorbachev's policies or his removal and replacement at the seat of power by supporters of their movement.

What would that mean for Soviet Jews? The answer is all too clear from the similarity of the monarcho-Nazis' program to that of Hitler. The Russian monarcho-Nazis already possess their equivalent to Hitler's SA and SS, in the form of the Pamyat movement. This movement does not disguise its intentions to carry out pogroms against the Jews, to whom it refers using the insulting word "zhidy" (yids). In fact, members of Pamyat have been organizing well-attended meetings all over the country to call for pogroms—even in Moscow's Red Square on Nov. 12, 1989—and no one has stood in their way.

Hitler treated as Jews those who have more than one-quarter Jewish blood. Pamyat goes further. It has announced its intention to search for Jewish progenitors back to the 10th generation. New recruits to Pamyat are required to prove their "racial purity" and to provide to the organization the home addresses of five Jews—no doubt for the purposes of the pogroms to come. Opponents of the monarcho-Nazi movement who happen to be "racially pure" or "Aryan" are characterized, along with all liberal intelligentsia, as "masons" (or "zhido-masons," i.e., supporters of Jews); and these are also the targets of pogrom propaganda.

The brazenness of monarcho-Nazi threats against Soviet Jewry has been increasing. In addition to anti-semitic rallies and the desecration of Jewish cemeteries around the country, which have been going on for some time, it now seems that meetings of liberal intellectuals are no longer safe from disruption by Pamyat thugs.

On the evening of Jan. 18 of this year, for example, a meeting of the progressive "April" group of writers at the Central House of Writers in Moscow was invaded by some dozens of Pamyat monarcho-Nazis with megaphones. They roughed up some of the writers, forcibly ejected others from the hall, shouted anti-semitic slogans and announced that their next visit will be with automatic weapons. They also designated St. George's Day, at the beginning of May, for a pogrom. The police were called but took their time in arriving, and there were no arrests.

Further increases in anti-semitic activities (especially, of course, actual violence) surely will lead to a mass exodus of Jews, people of partly Jewish extraction and "racially pure" liberal intelligentsia. This new wave of emigrants—refugees from monarcho-Nazi power—could reach several millions and would represent a serious brain-drain from the U.S.S.R.

As for the possibility of another Holocaust, it certainly could not reach the scale of earlier Nazi crimes: The world has changed too drastically in the last half century for that. But a wave of pogroms more or less along the lines of the infamous "Kristallnacht" cannot be ruled out—weaker if a government like the present one tries to oppose them, stronger if a successor government of the monarcho-Nazi stripe sympathizes with the pogrom lust.

What should be done? As a start, the world public should be informed of the activities and intentions of the new followers of Hitler in the Soviet Union and should be told their names. The famous "Brown Book" published by anti-fascists in 1933, after all, was the first important step in the exposure of the Nazi crimes of that era. Clearly, the publishers of newspapers, journals and books, and producers of electronic media, have an important role to play.

The stakes are high. If the monarcho-Nazis prevail and perestroika collapses in an orgy of chauvinism and racism, the results are likely to include not only a rapidly growing degree of anarchy in the Soviet Union but even the outbreak of civil war. In a country still laden with tremendous stockpiles of nuclear and chemical weapons, as well as a widespread network of nuclear power plants, such a chain of events could quickly become not just a national but an international catastrophe.●

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, February 16 marked the 72d anniversary of the day on which Lithuania became an independent nation. In commemorating this important date, we recall the remarkable accomplishments made by the Lithuanian people in the social, economic, and cultural life of their country, during its 22 years of independence.

During the past year, Lithuania has led the charge among Soviet Republics toward democracy and self-determination. The Lithuanian people have earned the attention and admiration of the world through their uniquely bold, yet peaceful and disciplined campaign to regain their usurped independence.

Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev went to Vilnius last month to dissuade Lithuania from leaving the Soviet Union; but instead, bowing to overwhelming pressure from the Lithuanian people, he conceded in principle to Lithuanian demands of self-determination for their nation. As Gorbachev continues to accede to the agenda set by the Lithuanian opposition, the issue of Lithuanian independence becomes increasingly a question of, as a Washington Post headline put it, "not just if, but when." It is my sincere hope that, because of the unceasingly courageous and thoughtful actions of the Lithuanian people, 1990 may be the last year Lithuanians commemorate their Independence Day under Soviet control.

I urge my colleagues to join in expressing their solidarity with the Lithuanian people, and in reassuring them that Americans are committed to seeing that full rights of self-determination are restored to Lithuania.●

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

IMAGE, ACTION AND EXPECTATIONS: MEDIA AT THE CROSSROADS

HON. LOUIS STOKES
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker—

The American media must begin now to make a reality of integration—both in product and personnel.

That was the conclusion of a study issued 21 years ago by the Kerner Commission, which was appointed by President Lyndon Johnson to examine the causes of civil disturbances that shook our Nation. The Commission charged that the media had neglected the presence and rights of black Americans.

Just recently, Dwight M. Ellis, vice president of minority and special services for the National Association of Broadcasters, examined the media's record since the issuance of the Commission's findings. Mr. Ellis, a respected and articulate representative of the media industry, delivered a thought-provoking address on the challenges facing the media in the multicultural society we expect to become by the year 2000.

In his remarks before the Black Professionals Association in Cleveland OH, Mr. Ellis reminded the audience that "by the year 2000, Hispanics, Asian Pacifics, and African-Americans, in that order, will constitute more than half of all Americans." He spoke of the responsibility of the media in responding to this factor, both in terms of the people behind the news production and those who work in front of the camera.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to bring Mr. Ellis' remarks to the attention of my colleagues. It is certainly worthwhile reading:

IMAGE, ACTION AND EXPECTATIONS: MEDIA AT THE CROSSROADS

(Remarks by Dwight M. Ellis)

Twenty-one years ago, when President Lyndon Johnson appointed a Commission to examine the causes of civil disturbances that shook this Nation, the media and America as a whole were charged with neglecting the presence and rights of black Americans.

The Kerner Commission, named after the former Illinois Governor who chaired it, in part said: That "The press has too long basked in a white world, looking out of it, if at all, with white men's eyes and a white perspective." The report said that [this[is no longer good enough. The painful process of readjustment . . . . required of the American news media must begin now . . . [that] they must make a reality of integration—in both their product and personnel."

Recommendations from the Commission resulted in the institution of programs and actions responsible for most of the careers of minorities employed in media today: From Ed Bradley to Geraldo Rivera; from the black publisher of the Oakland Tribune in California, to thousands of minorities holding communication jobs from Cleveland to Seattle. In many ways, what happened two decades ago in this country caused shock waves of opportunities and expectations across this Nation that would move a powerful industry from "business as usual" to a dress rehearsal for survival in the 21st century.

It seems unfair and unjust to the survivors of those dynamic years, that too many of the hard-won gains of yesterday are endangered today with an uncertain future.

Ask the leadership of the National Association of Black Owned Broadcasters about the progress and future of African American owners of media properties. You'll find them angered and frustrated that for all their efforts to rise to the occasions of entrepreneurship the rules of the game are changing, and changing fast.

Recently, the U.S. Supreme Court decided to review the constitutionality of current FCC policies designed to increase minority ownership—a threat to the growth of minority-owned stations beyond an existing number of just over 200.

Ask the leadership of the National Association of Black Journalists about the increase of black journalists in media newsrooms, and you'll hear that less than 4 percent of the total of professional newsroom employees today are black; that nearly 60 percent of newspaper dailies in this country do not have minorities on their staffs; and that black male employees are leaving the ranks of newspapers and broadcasting, expressing limited opportunities for career advancement. You may even ask the leadership of Hispanic and Asian American journalism organizations about their progress and hear much of the same.

From all reports, you'll hear that the pendulum of progress is swinging backward at a time when the value of recruiting, training and promoting a productive multicultural workforce is in the best interests of the media, our communities and our Nation as a whole. If there were ever clear reasons for immediate action, what lies ahead demands all the wisdom and resources we can muster.

Because, the decade of the nineties will be like no other in our history. Those who seek to address the challenges ahead with attitudes and practices of the past are destined to fail. The handwriting's on the wall and the messages are becoming crystal clear with every passing day, that times are changing, and many will be pulled kicking and screaming into a world they never imagined.

It's time for all Americans to face the undeniable fact that the social equation of past decades is rapidly changing. Issues of race are no longer limited to blacks and whites with the growing populations of Hispanics and Asian Americans.

By 1999, Hispanics under 18 will outnumber blacks of the same age group; and 15 years into the year 2000, Hispanics will be the largest minority in this country. It's predicted that by the year 2000, Hispanics, Asian Pacifics, and African-Americans, in that order, will constitute more than half of all Americans—filling a void created by the declining birthrate of white Americans.

The impact of these shifting demographics will be felt by everyone, regardless of gender, race or economic status.

According to most Bureau of Labor statistics, the labor force will rise by 21 million workers between now and the year 2000. Women will outnumber men among new workers by 2-to-1 Minority men and women will capture about an equal number of jobs, while white women will fill about four times as many jobs as white men. Hispanic and Asian American workers are expected to increase by more than 70 percent, while the black labor force will grow by only 27 percent. That's what we can expect in the emerging workforce of the nineties and well into the year 2000.

As all this unfolds, what can we expect from the media? Will it be part of the problem as charged 21 years ago by the Kerner Commission, or will it be part of the solution to help ensure social tranquility and the productive growth of our Nation and all its citizens? I sincerely believe that broadcasters and gate keepers of the print media will do the right thing. But, not without the participation and responsible actions of the multicultural facets of our communities.

The stakes are too high and opportunities too promising for minorities in the 90's to forget the words of Frederick Douglas, who said that, "Power yields nothing without a demand." There's work to be done by all of us. To be passive and unprepared for the challenges ahead would be like wanting sunshine without heat, thunder without rain, and progress without pain.

As black Americans, we could spend precious time bemoaning the shortcomings of media and the problems of survival and advancement in broadcasting and print. We could also celebrate the countless gains evidenced by media stars and less known black and other minority managers and executives. But, time would be even better spent discussing strategies for moving forward toward greater involvement in this age of technology and information.

I've already mentioned media's present and future challenges. But you should be aware that many unsung supporters are stating the case and laying groundwork for the progress that we all deserve. Last week at the first of two annual meetings of the National Association of Broadcasters, Mauricio Mendez, a member of the board and a member of the NAB's Minority Executive Council Committee, called for serious focus and action on issues of equal employment opportunity. He urged his colleagues on the board to "review and debate the challenges and directions that [the] association must take to help ensure the survival of our industry over the next decade." Speaking from his experiences as one of few Hispanic television executives, Mr. Mendez warned that "strategies and attitudes that [were] applied in the past two decades will not work in the 90's. They won't work in managing our technologies," he added, "and they won't work in managing our workforce."

Nevertheless, a bit of history took place during the January NAB board meeting that makes us all proud. For the first time, a minority broadcaster was inducted into the NAB Broadcasting Hall of Fame. Hal Jackson, group chairman of the Inner City Broadcasting Corporation (owner of 6 radio stations and the Apollo Theatre in New York), now has his place in broadcast history with other famous Americans, including: Bob Hope, George Burns, Paul Harvey, President Ronald Reagan, and Lucille Ball.

With 50 years of distinguished service to the broadcast industry and minority communities of the United States, demonstrated by achievements in radio ownership, and leadership in establishing national minority youth organizations, Hal Jackson has earned this distinction without question.

Another gain to celebrate occurred last year when Ronald Townsend, a black broadcast executive with years of demonstrated excellence and success, was promoted from president of Gannett's leading TV station in the Nation's Capital to president of the Gannett Corporation Television Group (incidently, Gannett also owns the USA Today newspaper and many other communication enterprises.)

And who can deny the successes of Bryant Gumbel, Bernard Shaw, Bill Cosby, Oprah Winfrey, Arsenio Hall, and thousands of hard working professionals in front of and behind the camera.

It's been a long struggle from "Beulah" in 1950 to "Cosby" in 1989. And praises are fitting for television breakthroughs like NBC's "generations", the first presentation of a black family in a daytime soap; and the depiction of an interracial romance in ABC's "The Robert Guillaume Show."

In its early years, television, the industry's only free mass medium, in need of endless talent, featured blacks in a wide variety of roles, causing ebony to report in 1950 that the appearance of numerous blacks on TV was a "sure sign that television is free of racial barriers." Isn't sobering to be reminded that for all that's been done there's so much more to be accomplished.

That's why the progressive-minded people of Cleveland owe a debt of gratitude to the dedication and fine job that Donna Bryant and the Black Professionals Association have done to make this city forum possible. Just as you don't have to be Jewish to love bagels; you don't have to be black to advance the causes of EEO. So, for their financial support of this program, I congratulate the participating broadcasters of Cleveland.

It's important to keep hope alive in Cleveland and every community throughout this Nation. What must be done to productively meet the challenges of the 90's will undoubtedly involve the communication industries, and black, Hispanic, and Asian Americans must be a part of necessary solutions, or be relegated to the ranks of burdens or problems.

I would suggest that we cannot afford the continuance of the narrow-mindedness and bigotry that have plagued so much of the American experience during the 20th century. We are facing the dawning of an age of "globalization."

Luis Valdez, former union organizer and film producer of the successful movie, "La Bamba", summed it up so well recently when he said that, "The 21st century will produce a blending of peoples that we have never known, because America is destined to be the place where the races meet."

I'm also reminded of certain remarks made a couple of months ago by the chairman and CEO of Canada's largest educational broadcasting network as he defended the global value of public broadcasting.

He said that, "When broadcasters see national values and cultures as 'barriers,' it is not unreasonable to foresee attempts to demolish them." Promoting the illumination and the fostering of different voices in media, he made a statement that may well become a universal principle in the 90's for all Western nations of the world: "without diversity there is no freedom of choice."

So, to students, parents, professionals, broadcasters, and everybody else, in the words of Arsenio Hall—"let's get busy." This may be the last opportunity in our lifetime to help shape a new era; and like no other time in the history of this Nation, you're needed.

TRIBUTE TO CPL. GEORGE WASHINGTON CLUTE

HON. BILL SCHUETTE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. SCHUETTE. Mr. Speaker, it is with admiration and respect that I rise today to pay tribute to a Civil War veteran, Cpl. George Washington Clute.

I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the House a historic event taking place in Mt. Morris, MI, on Memorial Day, May 28, 1990, at the Mt. Morris Cemetery. A full memorial service is planned to bestow upon Cpl. George Washington Clute the honor he deserves but which he has never received.

This brave and dedicated veteran fought with Company I of the 14th Michigan Infantry during the Civil War. The contributions made by George W. Clute include the capturing of the colors of a Confederate unit during a fierce battle on the morning of March 19, 1865 in Bentonville, NC. For this courageous action he received the Congressional Medal of Honor in 1898.

Corporal Clute was buried at the Mt. Morris Cemetery in February 1919. This unheralded Civil War veteran will finally be honored with a full memorial service planned by the Congressional Medal of Honor Society of the United States and of the Disabled American Veterans Chapter 3 of Flint. A special ceremony will dedicate a Veteran's Administration grave marker designed for Medal of Honor recipients.

Mr. Speaker and my colleagues in the House, I hope you will join me in recognizing Cpl. George Washington Clute for an honor he has earned and which is indeed long overdue.

THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER

HON. BENJAMIN L. CARDIN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, I invite my colleagues to join me in commending the City Council of Baltimore on its unanimously adopted resolution to support "The Star Spangled Banner" as the national anthem of the United States of America.

Maryland is the birthplace of "The Star Spangled Banner." Francis Scott Key composed the anthem after a 25-hour bombardment of Fort McHenry, the only officially dedicated national historic shrine in America. The four-verse poem remains a lasting tribute to our country's courageous dedication to freedom.

Every day of the year, around the world, people sing "The Star Spangled Banner"—in public and private schools, at sporting events, at inaugural ceremonies, in foreign embassies, on military bases. Marylanders feel a special attachment to the confidence and pride which our anthem inspires.

Along with the Baltimore City Council, Gov. William Donald Schaefer, and my colleagues from Maryland, I am committed to preserving the "The Star Spangled Banner" as our national anthem:

SUPPORTING THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER

For the purpose of expressing support for "The Star Spangled Banner" as the national anthem of the United States of America and urging Maryland's Congressional Delegation to vote against H.R. 225.

Whereas, H.R. 225, a bill that is pending before the United States House of Representatives, seeks to change the national anthem from "The Star Spangled Banner" to "America, the Beautiful"; and

Whereas, Although "America, the Beautiful" is a moving song, "The Star Spangled Banner" has significance in our nation's history, as it was written by Francis Scott Key, who witnessed firsthand the bombardment of Fort McHenry, by the British during the War of 1812, an attack that was successfully repelled; and

Whereas, Within the first year of its publication, "The Star Spangled Banner" was the favorite patriotic song of our new nation; and

Whereas, The popular acceptance of "The Star Spangled Banner" continued through the end of the nineteenth century, its performance as the national anthem being required by both Army and Navy regulations in 1890; and

Whereas, "The Star Spangled Banner" was designated the national anthem by Act of Congress, March 3, 1931, thus inspiring continuing generations of Americans; and

Whereas, Unlike "America the Beautiful," "The Star Spangled Banner" has a hometown, Baltimore City, which has long taken pride in serving as national guardian and center for honoring the Flag, through annual "Salute the Flag" activities and with special observances at Fort McHenry which reflect the citywide sense of responsibility for keeping the Flag's inspiration alive for all Americans; and

Whereas, The entire neighborhood of Locust Point has long been dedicated to serving as the patriotic pathway to the Fort and its history, thus helping to perserve our nation's heritage of which "The Star Spangled Banner" is an important part; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the City Council of Baltimore, That the Council supports "The Star Spangled Banner" as our country's national anthem and urges Maryland's Congressional Delegation to vote against H.R. 225 and for Baltimore as seat of this national heritage; and be it further Resolved, That copies of this Resolution be sent to all members of Maryland's Congressional Delegation, to Governor William Donald Schaefer, Mayor Kurt L. Schmoke, Mr. John Tyler, Superintendent of Fort McHenry, Mr. Greg Barnes, president of the Locust Point Civic Association, Mr. Alan Walden, president of Patriots of Fort McHenry and Mr. Lou Kerber of the annual Salute the Flag Organization.

THE PRESENT STATE OF AFFAIRS IN ROMANIA

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today because I am concerned about the present state of affairs in Romania. After the December revolution, the National Salvation Front [NSF] took control of Romania as the interim government. The front pledged that it would stay out of politics after it had guided the Romanian people toward free and fair elections. Yet, on January 23, the front announced its intention to run candidates in the upcoming national elections. Other actions taken by the NSF include canceling a January 28 national referendum to outlaw the Communist Party and banning all spontaneous demonstrations.

Despite the front's avowal to allow 29 other political parties to participate in a coalition government until the national elections, it has practically guaranteed its domination of the coalition through its gerrymandering of seats. Half of the seats in the new 180-member coalition will go to the 30 political parties—each having 3 representatives, 42 will go to a representative from each county, and 48 will go to chosen individual members. If many of the regional and individual seats are filled by members of the front's regional and national committees, it will retain considerable control of the coalition. One theory, to which we must give serious consideration, expresses the belief that the NSF has loaded up some of the other 29 political parties with its Communist clones. They are masquerading under a separate banner so that the Communists will gain a majority of the seats in the coalition. Such tactics by Communist parties across the world are not without precedent.

The front has announced that national elections will be held on May 20 which will give it an insurmountable advantage if it participates as a political party because it controls the security forces, administrative organs, and media in Romania. Political parties that have just emerged from obscurity will have no time to organize an effective platform or strategy since the elections are being held at such an early date.

Mr. Speaker, this week I will introduce a bill that will express the sense of Congress that the President send a United States delegation to Romania to monitor the national elections to ensure that they are fair and free. I urge my colleagues to support me in this endeavor. I submit the testimony of Andrei Calciu, son of the famous Romanian freedom fighter, Father Gheorghe Calciu, who recently spent 2 weeks in Romania, studying the situation there. His testimony reveals that the NSF is more concerned with hanging onto power than with the wishes of the Romanian people. It demonstrates why the United States must do everything in its power to ensure that all political parties get a fair shake at winning the national elections.

THE ROMANIAN SITUATION AFTER THE DECEMBER 1989 REVOLUTION

(Testimony of Andrei Calciu)

In December the long oppressed Romanian people found the strength and the courage to fight back against the dictatorship of Nicolae Ceausescu. The toll in human lives and physical destruction was enormous. I went to Romania for a two-week trip and below you will find my analysis of the situation from the political, economical and social points of view.

1.—POLITICAL SITUATION

(a) The revolution seems to have been actually a poorly planned and executed coup, precipitated by the anger of the masses and coupled with a clever manipulation of the latter by the current members of the National Salvation Front (the english acronym is NSF). When put together, people, times and places where they showed up during the "spontaneous" revolution triggered on December 21st the clear, or almost clear, picture of a coup d'etat emerges. i.e. General Militaru, a retired officer with no visible ties to anybody in the NSF, only 50 minutes after the beginning of the revolution was already in position, in charge of the defense of the Radio Television Station in Bucharest and the scarcity of information in Romania can draw only one conclusion from his quick appearance there: he knew of what was to happen and he was in the neighborhood awaiting the signal to enter the building and take over as commander of the defense forces. At the time of his arrival there was no fighting yet at the Television Station.

(b) The NSF is, in the eyes of the politically aware Romanian citizens, the Communist Party. The truth is that indeed NSF is the same thing with the former Communist Party whose cadre have been shuffled and from which only the eyesores have been removed. The structure and the tactics have remained intact. i.e. NSF called a press conference during which they announced that through tens of thousands of letters and phone calls the mine and oil workers together with the students have begged them to participate in the upcoming election scheduled for May 20, 1990. Typical Stalinist method of manufacturing ad hoc public support for their movement.

(c) Mr. Iliescu, the interim President of Romania has already begun creating his own cult of personality in the media, since before January 1st, 1990 keeping close to his side Petre Roman—the Vice-President, building a platform for the two of them for the upcoming elections. This, plus the revival of some Stalinist methods, plus some internal NSF power struggles, were some of the reasons for which Dumitru Mazilu resigned from his position of Prime-Vice-President of the Free Romanian Republic on January 25, 1990 (D. Mazilu tried to resign once before on January 12). The NSF has established local chapters in many locations using the basic structure of the communist party cell.

(d) In a discussion held with some Soviet visitors, Mr. Iliescu declared that he does not agree with the idea of political pluralism and that the May elections are not only unnecessary, but also useless.

(e) Since before Christmas 1989 the NSF has been the only organized political body who had any kind of presence in the media and especially on TV (Romania has only one TV station and two radio stations that cover the entire country, or almost). Only around January 15, 1990 were the other parties in forming allowed to appear on TV and were given radio air time in limited amounts (10 minute blocks on TV and 20 minute blocks on the radio, once a week).

(f) Except for one of the parties that has had high level, secret contacts with the NSF none of the others had received access to the printing facilities to typeset posters and campaign pamphlets. The situation was unchanged, although promises to better it have been made, when I left Romania on January 23, 1990.

(g) The NSF has already enacted legislation that limits the right of the people to dissent in public. Downtown Bucharest has been declared off limits for protest demonstrations and those who desire to demonstrate must hold the marches outside the city and must have their demonstrations approved, giving two days notice; announcing them is not enough. Also threats by the NSF have been made public that the army will be used to disperse any "unlawful" demonstrations.

(h) All assistance to the political parties has been restricted by law to voluntary donations from private individuals residing in Romania and who are Romanian citizens. At the same time the NSF has promised that the money and the goods owned by the Communist party will be distributed to those political parties after taking a complete inventory and that those parties will be allowed to use that distribution for furthering their political goals. The only problem is the inventory is estimated to take 18 months and the elections will be held in only 4 months from now, therefore this is only a means to deprive the opposition of financial resources so badly needed in the campaign. Fortunately we have identified some loopholes and we intend to take full advantage of them.

(h) The cover-up has already begun, in Timisoara the newly appointed prefect has made public statements saying that only less than one hundred people died during the fights (since December 17, 1989). In Bucharest the NSF denies the fact that North Korea, Chinese and Libyan mercenaries fought side by side with the dictator's loyal forces. There is somebody in Bucharest who is in the possession of a videotape shot in the morgue of a hospital clearly showing oriental and arab looking corpses lying on top of each other before being thrown in the hospital's incinerator.

2.—ECONOMICAL SITUATION

(a) The economy of Romania with a volume of 2,000 billion lei (the local currency) per year is in a pitiful shape. There is a highly skilled labor force available, but the country lacks decent machinery and raw materials for producing competitive products; design services are very primitive and among many other factors the centralization of the economy is responsible in large for the country's industrial failures.

(b) The inflation has already begun, pushing the on-the-street exchange of the dollar to the 80-175 lei-per-dollar rate (officially the exchange rate is 1 US dollar for 11.27 lei). In the future 18-36 months the inflation and the unemployment are expected to read levels comparable to those from the days of the economy depression.

(c) As of January 24, 1990 no new legislation has been passed easing foreign investment in the country although the Minister of Foreign Trade and the other dignitaries I met with promised they would act upon my suggestions.

(d) There is great interest from the part of individual enterprises in Romania to enter into joint ventures with foreign companies.

(e) A great deal of assistance is still being expected by various ministries and departments.

(f) There is very little food in the stores of Romania because, apparently, the new government resumed its food products exportation to the Soviet Union.

(g) The Romanian agriculture had been neglected for the past 17 years because of the dreams of industralization of Nicolae Ceausescu and today there is a great need for revitalizing it. Assistance is expected both from private companies and from our Department of Agriculture. Mr. Calciu can provide complete details on what is needed and how it can be sent to Romania.

3.—SOCIAL SITUATION

(a) The population is divided in three categories:

1. Those who will not give up the fight;

2. Those who are disoriented and are waiting for a clearer situation; and

3. Those who are in a state political apathy.

(b) At this point in time the average person is still very pro-American, but a slight disappointment has started surfacing in regards to the lack of economical and medical assistance from our government. Whatever the International Red Cross reported, the situation is much, much worse. i.e. the ICRC has said on network TV in the United States that there are plenty of drugs and medical supplies in the country due to their efforts. On January 20, 1990 the Fundeni Hospital in Bucharest had not even received one single Tylenol pill, much less the many drugs the ICRC was alleging having provided; also the ICRC said there was no need for clothing, blankets and mattresses in the country and I myself saw people sleeping on the springs of the beds in the nursing homes wearing their top coats to bed.

(c) The anti-soviet attitude of the average person has increased in the past month, but the leaders of the country are very pro-soviet (Ion Iliescu and Petre Roman especially) and they are actively working at reversing this trend. Unless our presence there increases, we risk to lose a great deal of popular support.

(d) There is large scale looting going on in the areas where the relief supplies are arriving, but the government finally started providing protection for the stored supplies, but no security exists yet for the convoys in transit.

Many of the supplies shipped already have disappeared like they never were. Some hoarding must occur somewhere, undoubtedly at the suggestion of the NSF. In the beginning the distribution of the supplies was done inefficiently, but now bottlenecking can not explain the lack anymore. The same thing happened during the 1970 floods and the 1977 earthquake when many of the supplies sent over as assistance were hoarded by the Ceausescu government and later sold to communist forces that were trying to conquer the power in third world countries.

More detailed information can be obtained by scheduling a personal interview with Mr. A. Calciu anytime.

DEPOSITOR PROTECTION AND FRAUD ACT OF 1990

HON. C. THOMAS McMILLEN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. MCMILLEN of Maryland. Today, my colleague CHARLES SCHUMER and myself are introducing the Depositor Protection and Fraud Act of 1990. We hope that you will join us as a cosponsor of this important legislation.

I was deeply disturbed by the testimony before the House Banking Committee last fall of four small investors who had lost their savings as a result of the Lincoln Savings & Loan Association debacle. These investors, like many others, lost their hard-earned savings by purchasing bonds offered by Lincoln's holding company, American Continental Corp. of Phoenix. These investors purchased these bonds because they incorrectly thought they were federally insured since they were sold in Lincoln branches.

This legislation would prevent a repetition of this tragedy by prohibiting the sale in a retail branch of a federally insured bank or S&L of certain specified types of debt or stock in any affiliate of the bank or thrift. It would also give the regulators the explicit authority and mandate to protect depositors if they determine that any uninsured product being offered by the bank or S&L could be confused by a retail customer for an insured deposit.

Both the Securities and Exchange Commission [SEC] and the Office of Thrift Supervision [OTS] support regulations prohibiting federally insured institutions from selling their own debt securities or the stock of an affiliate in areas of their branches that are commonly accessible to depositors. The outlawing of this practice is also supported by the president of the Association of Thrift Holding Companies, Patrick Forte, who has stated that the prohibition of the sale of "lobby debt" would "be supported vigorously by everyone in the [S&L] business."

This bill is the marriage of two pieces of legislation which dealt with this issue previously introduced by each of us, H.R. 3721 and H.R. 3777. The combination is an improved piece of legislation, which will come before the House Subcommittee on Financial Institutions for hearings in March and hopefully will be passed expeditiously by the Banking Committee and this body of Congress.

TRIBUTE TO RHODE ISLAND'S VETERANS' HOME

HON. RONALD K. MACHTLEY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. MACHTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to offer my congratulations and praises for the Rhode Island Veterans' Home which is celebrating its century of service for Rhode Island's veterans.

The original Rhode Island Soldiers' Home was created in 1890 as a home for veterans of the Civil War. The original home, located in Bristol, RI, housed 140 veterans and operated its own dairy and produce farms for over 60 years. Beginning in the 1930's, several attempts were made to change the home's location until finally in 1949 the Rhode Island Legislature proclaimed the Rhode Island Soldiers' Home the Rhode Island Veterans' Home.

Beginning in the early 1950's, the home has continually sought to improve and expand its services and facilities to its residents. After 100 years of dedicated and expert service, the Rhode Island Veterans' Home has developed into one of the finest convalescent and nursing homes in the Nation. The home provides long-term health care and rehabilitation programs for its residents with the goal being to return the veterans back to their homes and communities.

The home's history is marked by outstanding individuals who have given their time and effort to preserve and develop the home as one of the finest in the land. The centennial celebration is dedicated to those people who fought to maintain the home and the objectives it set out to accomplish 100 years ago. It is with great pleasure that I join with the rest of Rhode Island in celebrating the Rhode Island Veterans' Home century of service.

THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL TO INCREASE FUNDING FOR MAGNET SCHOOLS

HON. JOHN MILLER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of increased funding for magnet schools. Expanding the use of magnet schools increases choice, expands opportunities for children, and ultimately improves the quality of education in all schools.

The President has requested an additional $1 million for magnet schools of excellence, expanding the Magnet Program to schools which are not under a desegregation plan or court order. The budget request for magnet schools for desegregation is basically the same as last year. It is my wish that this funding would not only be maintained but could eventually be increased.

Americans cherish their right to choose. The theory behind open enrollment is to allow parents a wider choice of schools for their children. Schools will then compete with one another for students, and will be forced to improve performance or lose their enrollment. National studies show parental choice and participation within their child's school selection is one of the most important factors in determining the success of their child's education.

Choice and magnet schools alone are not a panacea for all the problems associated with education. It will take an integrated approach to address the multiple issues facing our educational system. I know we have the same goal; we want what is the best for our children. I hope we can pull together and work to make our educational system as successful as possible.

BRENDA WARD ADMINISTERS BICENTENNIAL PROGRAM FOR CONSTITUTION AND BILL OF RIGHTS

HON. BILL PAXON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. PAXON. Mr. Speaker, we have witnessed the closing of a decade in which millions of people throughout the world have toppled repressive regimes in their quest for freedom and democracy.

Here in the United States, we have enjoyed life under the oldest constitutional democracy in history, and our country serves as a beacon of hope and a model of freedom to the rest of the world.

At the same time, we must not neglect to pass on to our own children the respect and understanding of the underlying principles of our democratic institutions.

I am most pleased to commend the efforts of Ms. Brenda Ward, whose dedication to the improvement of the education of children in western New York and the Finger Lakes Region has been exemplary.

Brenda Ward coordinates the "We the People * * *" bicentennial programs on the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, which includes the National Bicentennial Competition, its noncompetitive companion program, Congress and the Constitution, and the National Historical Pictorial Map Contest in New York's 31st Congressional District.

Through Brenda Ward's dedicated efforts, thousands of elementary, middle, and high school students are being introduced to the philosophical ideas of the Founding Fathers that shaped our Constitution.

They learn about how our Government is organized and how the rights and liberties of individual citizens remain protected, and they learn the responsibilities that accompany the rights of citizenship in a democracy.

While people throughout the world are struggling for political freedom, we are plagued with political apathy here at home. Through the continued efforts of Brenda Ward and her colleagues in the "We the People * * *" programs, we can instill in our youth a renewed appreciation of the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank Brenda Ward for her impressive contributions to the development of competent and responsible citizenship.

RETROFITTING THE BOMB MACHINE

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, as we all look for the peace dividend from the dramatic events unfolding in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union let us closely examine where the cuts are to be made.

For the past 40 years the Los Alamos National Laboratory has been at the heart of our nuclear weapons program and more recently the star wars program. The scientists at Los Alamos have gathered a wealth of scientific knowledge that we must jealously guard as a national asset—valuable in times of peace as well as conflict.

I would like to call my colleagues attention to an article recently published in U.S. News and World Report entitled, "Retrofitting the Bomb Machine." The magazine points out that "Los Alamos invented the supercomputer; it is home to the largest concentration of computational power in the world. Its three dimensional graphics and applications programs are about 5 years ahead of the general market. It is the kind of place where scientists can, for fun, whip up a color 3-D simulation of a shock wave ripping apart a submarine."

The scientists at Los Alamos are excited about the political changes which lessen the need for weapons research and want the opportunity to provide their expertise in more peaceful areas, whether to improve the environment, in basic science, or industrial competitiveness. The same technology the lab has been working for the stars wars program may be applicable for making the next generation of computer chips. Just last week Business Week ran a major piece on the use of synthetic diamond surfaces for advanced microchips—something that Los Alamos scientists briefed me on a year ago.

As we beat our swords into plowshares let us not discard the basic steelmaking technology which makes both possible.

[From the U.S. News & World Report, Feb. 5, 1990]

RETROFITTING THE BOMB MACHINE

When I'd meet people on airplanes," says nuclear-weapons designer Thomas Seitz, "I used to say I worked at Los Alamos. Now, I say I work for the University of California. I am very genuinely concerned about the future. I see my field going down."

It's not easy being a cold warrior these days. Despite all the carefuly worded explanations a visitor to Los Alamos receives about the need to maintain America's nuclear deterrent even as the cold war melts away, there is no escaping one central fact about this artificial city that shares an isolated New Mexico mountain range with ancient Indian cliff dwellings, a Zen center and the Servants of the Paraclete, a monastic retreat for alcholic and pedophilic Roman Catholic priests. The business of Los Alamos is making bombs. And business isn't good.

Los Alamos is a child—and now perhaps an orphan—of the cold war. Forty-five years after the Manhattan project researched its successful conclusion with 13 pounds of plutonium vaporizing into a mushroom cloud over the New Mexico desert, the Los Alamos National Laboratory has transformed itself from a temporary wartime outpost of unpaved roads and Quonset huts on a site chosen for sheer remoteness into a $1-billion-a-year institution, that, as laboratory officials are quick to point out, is the state's largest employer. Despite a brief interval immediately after the war, when the laboratory's newfound purpose was to explore peaceful uses of atomic energy, and despite a blip in the 1970s, when Jimmy Carter decreed that the national weapons laboratories would go to work solving the energy crisis, the lab's real character has always been faithful to its birthright. The first Soviet nuclear test in August, 1949, quickly plunged Los Alamos back into the weapons business, turning out an average of five new nuclear-warhead designs each year during the '50s. Ronald Reagan's defense buildup provided a second shot in the arm in the '80s. At the peak of the Manahattan Project, the laboratory staff numbered 1,000; now, four times that many, or about half of the total staff, are employed on nuclear-weapons research.

BIKINI STREET BLUES

"We have a very proud heritage," says Deputy Director James Jackson. "Two-thirds of the nuclear weapons in the current stockpile were designed here." His sincerity is what is so disconcerting. Los Alamos is probably the only place in the country—with the single possible exception of its rival weapons lab, Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory outside San Francisco—where the local science museum's educational exhibits include a computer game that challenges visitors to design their own warhead re-entry vehicle. It is definitely the only place in the country where the city streets are named after nuclear-weapons tests: Trinity, Eniwetok, Bikini.

Government-paid scientists are much too experienced politicians to start proclaiming nostalgia for the cold war, however much their prosperity hinges upon it. The phrase "Peace is breaking out" has joined the other engineers' cliches as a staple of the viewgraph presentations that describe the laboratory's programs. The scientists are also much too discreet to come right out and say that designing bombs is fun. But it's not hard to draw that conclusion when they keep talking about the scientific and terminal challenges of their work and the excellent facilities that "derive from this mission." Providing the ultimate security guarantee of the nation is a good justification for buying a lot of nice scientific equipment. Los Alamos invented the supercomputer; it is home to the largest concentration of computational power in the world. Its three-dimensional graphics and applications programs are about five years ahead of the general market. It is the kind of place where scientists can, for fun, whip up a color, 3-D simulation of a shock wave ripping apart a submarine.

So, even if the Russians aren't coming, there are other reasons to keep on with the job. "We all want to reduce the number of weapons," insists lab director Siegfried Hecker. "But we're still going to have to design different nuclear weapons to keep deterence credible." The new rallying cry of the weapons designers is "safety." Get past the eerie irony of "safe" nuclear weapons, and there is a serious point: No matter how small the superpowers' nuclear stockpiles become, improvements in design will be needed to make the weapons less likely to go off when they're not supposed to. But the arguments always seem to come back to the work itself: The only way to keep together a core of scientists who understand the mysteries of bombs is to let them build bombs and to set them off once in a while. "Some of the best nuclear-weapons people actually left the lab during the late '50s and early '60s when we had a testing moratorium," points out Buck Thompson, assistant to the director. Or, as Seitz puts it: "Have you ever asked an experimentalist to design something and never turn it on?"

ON TO INDUSTRY

Still, the bomb makers are starting to hedge their bets. Hecker speaks enthusiastically about the contributions Los Alamos can make to energy, environment, basic science, industrial competitiveness; he sees nondefense research growing to one third of the lab's work in the next few years. "We know how to run big, goal-oriented projects," he says. Others point out that the lab is especially well suited to work with industry, since it has experience in delivering a "product."

Economic rationales creep in everywhere, even into the Strategic Defense Initiative projects, which account for about $100 million of the lab's annual budget. Sidney Singer, who directs one of the lab's showcase Star Wars technologies, the free-electron laser, acknowledges that tight budgets have hurt some crucial, planned tests of the laser's military utility. But all is not lost: The same technology might be the key to making the next generation of computer chips. "World War III is an economic war," Singer declares. "We have to figure out how to mobilize and defend ourselves."

It's not all rhetoric, though. The lab's supercomputing capabilities put it in a good position to get a piece of the action in the booming industrial-competitiveness business. Los Almos researchers who developed elaborate computer models to study exactly what happens in a nuclear explosion have used the same basic techniques to develop a widely used computer simulation of the combustion of fuel in an automobile engine. The Energy Department's own problems in cleaning up the environmental mess at the plants where plutonium is made and the bombs assembled, such as Hanford, Fernald and Rocky Flats, are providing a slightly ironic windfall, too; the annual budget of Los Alamos's small environmental-research program jumped from $3 million to $25 million in a single year.

Finally, there is the possibility of some genuine peace dividends. New arms-control agreements being negotiated this year will be very hard to police, and that means spending lots of money inventing new verification systems—gadgets to detect and count nuclear warheads, sensors to monitor nuclear tests. For 25 years, verification has been a Los Alamos speciality. The problem of how to destroy missiles banned by arms-control treaties may fall to the lab, too. Stricter air-pollution rules may soon prohibit getting rid of outlawed missiles by firing them, as is being done now with the Pershing 2s eliminated by the INF treaty. Los Alamos researchers have been developing technologies that chemically neutralize the high-explosive residues built up over the years in some of the lab's test sites, and the same processes may be able to extract rocket fuel from missiles.

However scientifically and technically well-equipped Los Alamos may be to become a patron saint of U.S. industry and a mecca for basic research, it still has to overcome a legacy of secrecy for secrecy's sake that won't quite go away. During the war, workers were not allowed to use the words "Los Alamos"; birth certificates listed the parents' address as "P.O. Box 1663, Sandoval County, Rural." It took until 1957 for the fences and gates that surround the entire community to come down; it took until 1969 to declassify a letter, now in the lab's archives, ordering Manhattan Project Director J. Robert Oppenheimer not to drive long distances without an armed escort. In 1965, the U.S. government finally began to sell houses and businesses to private individuals, but old reminders of the town's past remain. Most towns do not have all their churches on one side street, or apartment houses that look suspiciously like World War II Army barracks.

Hecker acknowledges that the tradition of secrecy has been an obstacle to cooperating with industry; it also gets in the way of doing basic science. Especially international basic science, and especially with Soviets. Nonetheless, in one of the weirder signs of the times, a team from Los Alamos and a team from the Kurchatov Institute—the Soviets' bomb-design lab—are putting together a joint proposal to build one of the huge instruments needed to carry out research on the new U.S. atom smasher, the Super-conducting Super Collider. Los Alamos physicist Gary Sanders is heading for Moscow this month to finish writing up the bid. Why is the Kurchatov Institute getting involved in this? "They obviously have some of the same concerns about the future we do," says Sanders.

A LIFESAVER—THE LOW INCOME HOME ENERGY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

HON. JOSEPH E. BRENNAN

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. BRENNAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to an article in today's Washington Post titled "In Cold Spell, U.S. Heating Assistance Plan Becomes a Lifesaver." The lifesaving "heating assistance plan" being identified is the Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program, or LIHEAP. As the article states, LIHEAP assists low-income families and individuals—primarily senior citizens and households with young children—with heating costs. LIHEAP currently serves 5.9 million households, only 30 percent of eligible families.

I believe the following article highlights the personal and human need for home energy assistance. The beneficiaries of LIHEAP are real people who are making real choices between heating their homes and feeding themselves or their children. I encourage all of my colleagues to read the article below while placing themselves and their loves ones in the shoes and homes of LIHEAP beneficiaries. The choices these individuals face are unacceptable and while they continue to be faced with choices between food and heat, the President has proposed to further cut declining LIHEAP funds from $1.4 billion this year to $1.05 billion next year.

The article below illustrates the impact of the simultaneous cold front and increased heating oil prices experienced throughout several parts of the Nation in late December and early January. I have introduced legislation, H.R. 3851, to provide an additional $200 million for LIHEAP and to target the additional funds to those States hit hardest by the recent heating crisis. I would like to urge those colleagues interested in assisting families with home energy needs to join my efforts by cosponsoring H.R. 3851.

The Washington Post article follows:

IN COLD SPELL, U.S. HEATING ASSISTANCE PLAN BECOMES A LIFESAVER

(By Thomas W. Lippman)

STEVENS POINT, WIS.—For people who don't have money, a blast of winter like the recordbreaking cold wave in December stretches the lifeline very tight. Skyrocketing fuel bills break skimpy budgets. Old furnaces expire. Children sleep in their clothes. Just ask Margaret Raikowski.

Five days before Christmas, when the wind chill equivalent was 60 below zero and icy blasts swept through the bales of hay piled around the base of her ramshackle farmhouse to insulate the pipes, the Raikowski family ran out of heating oil. They had no money to buy more.

Raikowski's husband was working at a construction job. But the cold weather forced schools to close so her five children—ages 10, 8, 5, 4 and 2—were at home with her, huddled around a balky wood stove.

"If you stood six feet away from that stove, you were cold," said Raikowski, 28. "We get oil only when we pay on delivery and I just didn't have the money." Even if she did, she said, "we were having lots of problems with that furnace. It would click on and then shut right down again."

The children slept in their coats and went to a relative's house to bathe, Raikowski said. But unexpected help arrived suddenly in the person of Julie Hovden, coordinator of low-income home energy assistance for the Community Action program of Portage County. Alerted to the Raikowskis' plight by a utility worker, Hovden dipped into the heating program's emergency funds to get the Raikowskis a new propane-burning furnace and a tank of fuel.

"They came on Friday and by Saturday everything was done," Raikowski said. "It was a very nice Christmas present." The Raikowskis had joined the 5.9 million U.S. households—including about 205,000 in Maryland, Virginia and the District—receiving aid from the federally funded Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program (LIHEAP).

The December cold wave and the parallel run-up in fuel prices that month focused new attention on LIHEAP, which is financed through the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services and administered by the states through county governments or community action offices—part of what used to be called the antipoverty program.

Federal LIHEAP funding has been declining steadily, from $1.83 billion in fiscal 1987 to the current $1.393 billion. President Bush's budget for fiscal 1991 proposes spending $1.05 billion. Supporters of the program—including many members of Congress, a score of governors and the American Gas Association, whose members sell the fuel that heats about three-quarters of all U.S. households—want a $300 million supplemental appropriation for this year, to cover the extraordinary demands of December, and $2.5 billion in fiscal 1991, which begins Oct. 1.

Two weeks after helping the Raikowskis, Hovden was in Washington to represent the heating assistance program at a congressional hearing into the causes and consequences of the sudden sharp rise in home heating bills caused by the December cold snap, and to ask for more money.

"If we have normal January weather in Wisconsin," she said, "our agency's crisis funds will be exhausted by mid-February. We desperately need to get help from somewhere. * * * Naturally, we will not be paying people in March and April, and we won't have any money to help people next fall. * * * Clients who have no heat in their homes are desperate. They come to our office filled with despair, fear, frustration and anxiety." Similar pleas came from New Hampshire, Nebraska, Massachusetts and Connecticut.

The relatively mild weather of January and February has staved off the crisis that seemed imminent at Christmastime, but supporters of the heating program say the need for aid is not diminished, only postponed. The average annual benefit per household is about $215, usually in the form of a one-time payment that covers the cost of a tank of propane or perhaps two months' natural gas bills. According to Meg Power, Washington legislative representative for the National Community Action Foundation, an advocate for the community organizations, the average income of a LIHEAP household is under $7,000 a year.

Even with the federal aid, she said, "low income households can spend a large chunk of the year with no power. It's a real possibility to millions."

The present funding level, according to Power and other advocates of LIHEAP, covers about 30 percent of eligible households. The eligibility level for assistance in most states is 125 percent of poverty, as defined by the federal government.

"Among the elderly and working poor, a large number of people don't want government assistance," said Hovden's boss, Portage County CAP director Karl Pnazek. "But when the price of a tank of propane went from $180 to $320, they couldn't pay it."

Pnazek, who has a Bobby Kennedy for President poster on his office wall, said he and his staff "tell people not to be embarrassed. We tell them, these are your tax dollars." Not only are the clients not "welfare cheats," he said, but "some of them even try to pay the money back when the crisis passes. We tell them there's no provision for payback."

At Hovden's request, several recipients of heating aid in this area agreed to be interviewed, to illustrate the scope of the program. Among them:

Ray Wilhelm, 60, once a prosperous businessman who has fallen on hard times. In two years, his wife died, his appliance business went bankrupt and he entered a Veterans Administration hospital for back surgery that left him unable to work. His income is $531 a month from an Army disability fund.

"They paid for my fuel last winter and it was a godsend," he said. "I had nothing. It's hard to swallow when you've been your own man for many years." Wilhelm pays $20 a month to his fuel oil supplier and $30 a month on his electric bill. Hovden's office pays the rest and, from separate weatherization funds, is insulating his house and installing a more efficient furnace.

Carrol Harris, 62, a widow living on $566 a month in Social Security payments, plus a supplement she gets for taking in an 87-year-old "foster adult" whom she cares for.

She uses propane for heat, cooking and hot water. The price went from 63 cents a gallon in November to $1.27 in January. As she used more fuel in the intense cold, her bill rose from $173 in November to $351, just as her property tax fell due. "I don't like to ask for help," she said. "There's others worse off than I am. But I was devastated."

Kenneth Waterson, 35, an unemployed truck driver with a chronic back ailment, and his wife, Jeanne, 29, whose dermatitis forced her to give up a job at a food processing plant. Their monthly income is $465 in public assistance. With their infant daughter, they live in a mobile home, on which the monthly payment is $215. They have a color television, a telephone answering machine, a microwave oven and comfortable furniture, but Waterson said almost all of it is hand-me-down from family members.

"You can only go so far on $465 a month," he said. "Where would we be without the heating aid? Out on the street, probably. We sure wouldn't have any electricity." Even with the assistance, he said, they keep their thermostat at 60 degrees, and are able to keep the house at that temperature because Hovden's office paid for furnace repairs and the installation of an insulated roof that cut their fuel consumption in half.

There were others: Walter Meshak, 65, who worked 42 years for a soda distribution company with no pension plan, and his disabled wife, living on Social Security; Agnes Klish, 80, trying to keep her farmhouse now that her 85-year-old husband is in a nursing home; Mary Plummer, 35, living in a mobile home with two children and her husband, a self-employed carpet layer making about $600 a month. All said they were unhappy about needing help, but not too proud to accept it.

All of them, Hovden said in her Washington testimony, "have terrible choices to make. If they are without heat, they must move in with family or friends or stop buying food and medicine, or stop paying their rent, mortgage payments and electricity bills." If they move out and leave their dwellings unheated, she said, their pipes freeze and burst. "If they can't afford heat," she said, "they certainly can't afford a plumber."

As for Margaret Raikowski, she has since taken a night-shift job at a potato processing plant. Even with the additional income, Hovden said, the family income is still low enough to keep them on the heating aid list.

FREE SPIRIT

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, in these days of great change around the world, we see the triumph of the human spirit in many forms and in many contexts. Mr. Joseph Piro, a constituent of mine from Morrisville, PA, uses the metaphor of the Berlin Wall to express this victory in a very moving poem that he has entitled "Free Spirit." I ask that this poem be included in the RECORD at this point, and recommend it to my colleagues.

FREE SPIRIT

As people we build a wall of separation with our ideology, thoughts and ways. Perhaps, we stand astride the wall we have built and observe what is taking place on the other side. Others build with brick and mortar. Can a wall made with brick and mortar keep out the spirit of freedom? No amount of force of men and guns can subdue or destroy a free spirit. Because when that person or people are done away from the face of the earth, there are those who have breathe in the selfsame spirit to continue.

We are prisoners to ourselves when we allow the spirit of might to so shackle us, to snuff out the spirit of freedom.

And when that spirit of freedom is taken away from us—we die.—June 1989, Joseph Piro.

DANGER TO WORKERS IN THE NATION'S CAPITAL

HON. JAMES H. (JIMMY) QUILLEN

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House some information I have received concerning the safety of workers in the District of Columbia.

The material was provided to me by a leading lawyer in this city, George Webster, of the law firm of Webster, Chamberlain and Bean. George Webster, who is from my district, has provided me with a copy of a memo sent to the tenants of his office building which is one block from the White House. The memo recommends what would seem to most of us to be somewhat extreme security measures. The fact that the management of a building one block from the White House feels the need to make such recommendations is another indication that we have a real problem assuring the safety of persons and property in the District of Columbia. For the information of Members, the full text of the memo follows:

MEMORANDUM

To: Mills Building tenants, 1730 Pennsylvania Avenue tenants, 1747 Pennsylvania Avenue tenants.

Date: February 9, 1990.

Subject: Office thefts/building security.

Many office thefts and crimes against persons occur during regular business hours. Such crimes are usually perpetrated by persons under the pretext of conducting legitimate business; such as visitors, vendors, messengers, repairmen, etc. Security, to a great extent, depends on the cooperation and interest of each individual. Please take a moment to review the following security procedures/suggestions.

The following measures can improve the security of your individual space as well as the common areas of the building:

1. Never leave your reception area unattended. Do not allow visitors to pass beyond the reception area unless they are known to the receptionist or other office personnel who are aware of their business.

2. Report all suspicious persons to the General Manager, Chief Engineer, Lobby Attendant and/or Police Department. For your reference the numbers to the D.C. Police Department are as follows: 911—

Emergency, 727-4326—Non-Emergency, 282-0043—Theft Unit.

3. Always lock your door when arriving early or working late.

4. Never leave purses, wallets or other valuable items on or under your desks. Keep these items out of sight.

5. Cash, stamps and similar items should not be kept in an unlocked drawer. Valuables should be kept in a safe or other secured areas; out of sight to a passerby.

6. Avoid carrying large sums of money on your person.

7. Avoid leaving your wallet in a jacket hung over your chair or behind your door.

8. Beware of the repair man who enters your suite to make an inspection and states he/she is to pick up equipment, etc. Question the person, obtain identification and check with his/her firm for verification.

9. Do not be fooled by a uniform. Uniforms are often used as disguises. Always ask for identification.

10. Never leave a combination type safe on a day lock position. Thieves are aware that most people dislike manipulating the dial each morning to open the safe and will always turn the dial back to zero if it is in the day lock setting. Always spin the dial when locking your safe.

11. Immediately report all peddlers or other solicitors to the General Manager, Chief Engineer or Lobby Personnel. Do not attempt to apprehend or detain an unauthorized person, call building management.

12. Do not permit persons making deliveries to wander through your suite without an escort. Be alert to persons who enter an office under the pretext of seeking employment.

13. Change locks if keys are missing or unaccounted for.

14. Exercise care and caution when traveling alone to your vehicle after normal business hours. Garage facilities are usually unattended at night and on weekends. Always secure your automobile by locking all windows and doors. Do not leave anything of value on the seats in the glove compartment or hanging within view.

15. Do not enter an elevator if it is occupied by a suspicious looking person. Simply walk away.

16. Always carry your Kastle key to assure rapid access to the building and to prevent a passerby from hearing and later using your name to gain entry.

17. Immediately report all lost or stolen Kastle keys to Kastle Systems, Inc. at 524-7911. Call Kastle Systems, Inc. Customer Service if you have any questions about the Kastle System.

We encourage you to review these measures and solicit your cooperation and support. A joint effort can greatly reduce the number of unavoidable office thefts and provide everyone with a greater sense of security.

CHET CHAMBERS' NOTES ON CENTRAL AMERICA

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, recently, a respected minister and diligent citizen from my district traveled to Honduras, Guatemala, and Nicaragua. He has journeyed there many times. His latest "Journal Notes" from this trip contain instructive insights for all Americans, especially those of us who must vote on U.S. policy toward these nations. His conclusions reveal a deep and growing uncertainty about America's role in building a lasting peace in Central America. He questions if it is time for America to withdraw completely—or, if we stay, what positive role can America play in building social and economic progress in these nations. He pointed out to me in a private conversation that in Honduras, which historically had no oligarchy and thus could have moved toward democratic reform more quickly, United States aid in the past 10 years has actually resulted in the development of a new oligarchy not necessarily dedicated to land reform and social betterment. He told me he has a real concern that there is a move to discredit the upcoming Nicaraguan elections, in the event the U.N.O. does not win, he hopes the United States will accept the findings of the official observer teams from the United Nations and the Organization of American States. In Guatemala, earlier efforts toward land reform have been squashed and even using the words can result in death.

I present these notes of Chester V. Chambers, Toledo, OH:

CHET CHAMBERS' NOTES ON CENTRAL AMERICA

"In taking notes on what these people are saying," requested our guide in Guatemala, "please don't put down their names or other data by which they might be identified. Their lives might well be endangered if your notes were read and confiscated by a customs official." She said these words as we talked with a Catholic priest in an isolated small town on New Year's Day, and the next day with the wife of an Evangelical pastor in a larger rural community.

I was traveling as one of eleven people in a PAX-World Central America Study Seminar arranged by the Rev. Fred Morris, former United Methodist missionary in Latin America. We spent four days in Guatemala, seven days in Nicaragua, and three days in Honduras. For me it was an opportunity to return to Nicaragua and to revisit the city of Esteli where I spent five weeks two years ago. It also provided an interesting opportunity for some comparisons of the three countries.

The parish of the Guatemalan priest was surrounded by coffee plantations. He told us that 2% of the farmers own 62% of the arable land, including that which is most productive. Most farmers are subsistence farmers, growing corn on the poorest land. The fields of these subsistence farmers were very visible to us as we drove through mountainous country seeing patch after patch of corn growing on slopes at an angle of 30 to 45 degrees.

Another day, we visited an Evangelical parish in a rural province where a group of pastors, all with other jobs, are serving churches in eleven communities. We talked with the wife of one of the pastors who said. "We work with the poor because that is what the Bible tells us to do." She told us that men working on farms in that area make about $1.50 per day, and have carried out unsuccessful protests to try to get this doubled. Women earn about $.60 for a day's work washing clothing, and the women with whom she is involved have agreed not to do it at that wage. In a factory there, one can earn $1.50 for a 12-hour day shift, and $1.80 for a 12-hour night shift. However, a family may consume $2 worth of corn in one day. These Evangelical churches have been organizing the women. She said that the Catholic priests and some other Evangelicals call them subversive.

Their major economic effort has been the organizing of a widows' weaving cooperative. In their eleven communities, they have involved about 160 women. they are selling their products for prices higher than we paid in the markets, because they are placing a higher monetary value on their labor. Some of their marketing is through church organizations outside their country. She told us that in these eleven communities there are about 1,700 children who have lost their fathers because the army killed them. Violence by the army was especially strong in their area in 1982.

A Canadian volunteer with GAM, the Mutual Support Group, told me that about 70,000 people had disappeared in Guatemala in the first half of the 80's. GAM was formed in 1984 when several relatives of disappeared people started talking at the city mortuary while looking for bodies of family members. They have become the most openly critical group of the repressive policies of the army. The opening of one of the windows of their office is now covered with sheet metal because a bomb was thrown through it last August. Spray-painted GAM graffiti was visible all through Guatemala City: "They were taken alive; we want them back alive."

We also visited a squatters community on the edge of Guatemala City where about 45,000 persons have thrown up shacks on vacant land. The government made early attempts at eviction but the squatters only returned, and now the government has accepted their presence and some electricity has been run into the area. We saw tank trucks selling water which was pumped into open 55 gallon drums. Their sewers are open ditches. One of the residents told us that the government has now told them that each of them will have to purchase the land on which they built their shacks at a price of about $6,000 for a lot 10 meters by 12 meters. The government wants payments of about $19 a month, but residents are trying to negotiate this down.

In Nicaragua, nearly everything was focused on the upcoming election which will be held next Sunday, February 25. When I was there two years ago there were 16 political parties. With the influx of money from the U.S. and western Europe, the number had grown to 22 parties through further fragmentation by last fall. At that time fourteen parties, strongly influenced by the United States, formed the National Opposition Union [UNO] to run one slate of candidates in opposition to the Sandinistas in the February election. UNO chose as its candidate for president Violeta Chamorro, publisher of the newspaper La Prensa, and for vice president Virgilio Godoy, head of the Independent Liberal Party.

Our group spent about an hour with vice-presidential candidate Godoy. He said that the two points of UNO's platform were national reconciliation and national reconstruction. When pushed by us for specifics he said that these remain to be developed, which is quite understandable when one realizes that this coalition includes the Communist and Socialist Parties along with centrist and right-wing parties. Since the formation of UNO, two of the parties and part of a third have pulled out of the coalition.

The first evening we were in Nicaragua we had dinner with Camilo Dufren, a member of the Christian Brothers order of the Catholic Church. He told us that all of the polls, except one published in La Prensa, have shown a substantial lead for Daniel Ortega and the Sandinistas over Violeta Chamorro and UNO. The most credible of these, he said, was conducted in late November by Hemispheric Initiatives from the United States using a pollster who had predicted the results of Cristiani's victory in El Salvador with only a 1% error, and the results of the presidential election in Paraguay with a 1.5% error. This poll showed 44% of the voters preferring the Sandinistas compared to 27% for UNO. While we were in Nicaragua El Nuevo Diario published results of a poll by a different organization showing 47% of the voters favoring Ortega and only 12% favoring Chamorro, a gain of 5% for Ortega and loss of 5% for Chamorro from their poll a month earlier.

We noted many billboards around Nicaragua publicizing the Sandinista candidates, and none for UNO, and asked Virgilio Godoy about this. He said that they had no money. When asked about the $9 million voted by the U.S. Congress for the Nicaraguan elections, at least half of which we understood was to go to UNO, he said that they have not allowed to spend any of this on propaganda. After talking with many Nicaraguans about this, several of us concluded that it will probably be the strategy of UNO and the United States government to try to discredit the elections since it seems clear that UNO has no chance of winning. This already appears to be happening in the United States.

I left our seminar group for two days and went by bus to Esteli, the city in northern Nicaragua where I spent five weeks two years ago. I visited the Pentecostal pastor and his family with whom I lived for those five weeks. Though they are not happy with the military draft, since their oldest son, Fulvio, is now in service and on patrol in areas where there are skirmishes with the Contras, they are supporting the Sandinistas in the election. They told me that Violeta does not understand the problems of the people, and that she does not have the experience to govern.

I believe that by the latest count there will be ten parties on the ballot, eight smaller parties in addition to the Sandinistas and UNO. Three of these parties are to the left of the Sandinistas. This will probably be the most observed election in the history of the world. My hope is that the United States government will accept the findings of the official observer teams from the United Nations and the Organization of American States as the definitive verdict on the fairness of the elections, and comply with the requests of the Central American presidents to disband the Contras.

As we moved to Honduras it soon became evident that this country is now the cornerstone of U.S. policy in Central America. We spent about two hours with six members of the U.S. Embassy staff there, which one staff member told us was one of the eleven largest U.S. embassies in the world. They gave us copies of a briefing book produced by the Embassy entitled "Handbook on Honduras: Democracy, Defense, Development, Diplomacy and Drug Control," at least half of which is devoted to attacking Nicaragua.

A national election was just held in Honduras in which the incumbent Liberal Party was defeated by the National Party. We talked with Leonides Rosa Bautiste, a lawyer and National Party member who had served in an earlier National Party government. He told us that Honduras faces a grave economic situation, that the Contras need to leave their country, and that the Hondurans see no need for a U.S. military presence with the elections in El Salvador and Nicaragua. He would like to see the money being spent on the military in Honduras by the U.S., used for social and economic programs in their country. That point of view was supported by considerable graffiti on walls in Tegucigalpa: "Go, Contras and gringos."

Manuel Torres, a Honduran journalist, pointed out to us that Honduras has been the poorest country in Central America. Despite all of the U.S. funds spent in Honduras over the past decade the economic conditions there have grown worse, a fact admitted by U.S. embassy personnel. Torres told us that only one out of four Hondurans is permanently employed, that there are over 200,000 peasant families without land, and that 75% of the children are undernourished with some degree of malnutrition.

Our Honduran guides, who were active Catholics, took us to a squatters settlement on the side of a mountain on the edge of Tegucigalpa in which they do ministry. Several hundred poor peasants move from the country to Tegucigalpa every month and settle in situations like this. Some shacks on the sides of these hills had been destroyed by mud slides during past rainy seasons.

I want to try to draw some comparisons between the three countries I visited. The vast majority of people in all three are poor. It is clear in Guatemala and Honduras that this is a long-standing phenomenon and that little is being done to change this situation. In Nicaragua it seems clear that the Sandinistas, who are dedicated to a more egalitarian society, have made attempts to change their situation, though the economy is now in a state of devastation. Opposition groups say that the Sandinistas have mismanaged the economy. The Sandinistas point out that half of the national budget in recent years has gone into the military because of the Contra war and fear of a U.S. invasion, and that the U.S. imposed trade embargo cut off Nicaragua's greatest market for export sales as well as making it very difficult for them to get needed supplies from the U.S.

Illiteracy has been a problem in all of these countries, and I am not aware of any efforts to change conditions in Guatemala and Honduras. On the other hand, the Sandinista government launched a massive literacy campaign in 1980 which lowered the rate of illiteracy in Nicaragua from 50% to 12%. Sadly, it has been difficult to continue this in war zones, and the illiteracy rate has now crept back up to 25%.

All of these countries face the problem of large migrations of peasants from rural areas to the cities. In Guatemala City and Tegucigalpa the results are squatters communities, while in Nicaragua I saw a number of housing developments for low income people initiated by the government, many with financial support from other countries.

There are strong contrasts regarding land ownership. A land reform program begun in Guatemala in the early 1960's by President Arbenz was reversed after a CIA-supported revolution overthrew him and instituted a military government. Now it is dangerous for anyone even to speak about land reform. In Honduras some peasant groups have occupied idle land in rural areas, but there have been no government programs to help increase the numbers of farmers owning land. In Nicaragua the Sandinistas instituted a huge land reform program in the early part of the last decade which had resulted by 1986 in over 4.4 million acres of land being placed in the hands of former peasants.

There are also strong contrasts regarding freedom of speech. In Guatemala, to advocate for any kind of social change is to become a candidate for disappearance. The situation is clearly better in Honduras, but even there there is fear that chills criticism. We met with the head of the independent Committee for the Defense of Human Rights in Honduras who has had at least one attempt on his life. In Nicaragua people are quite free to criticize the government, and certainly do, and there is very open advocacy for all political and economic points of view.

There are not a lot of success models in third world countries. When I look at Nicaragua in contrast with Guatemala and Honduras, it appears to me that the Sandinista government was making some real progress toward positive changes before they got bogged down by the Contra war and suffered further destabilization of their economy by the U.S. embargo. If we really believe in self-determination, we ought to be willing to accept the results of their upcoming election and realize that it is in the long-term self-interest of the U.S. to support social change in Latin America.

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

HON. BILL SCHUETTE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. SCHUETTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the First Congregational Church of Owosso, MI, which celebrates its 150th anniversary in 1990.

The church was founded in 1840 by 11 pioneers. By 1855 this small band of worshippers had grown to 52 members and a permanent affiliation with an established church body was sought. The First Congregational Church was received into the Genesee Association of the Congregation Church in 1853.

For the past century and a half, the church has been more then just a building and a series of ministers. It has developed into a congregation made up of people from many different backgrounds that has served as an example of social action in the community.

The First Congregational Church has stood for a century and a half and will continue to serve the community of Owosso for a long time to come.

Mr. Speaker, and my colleagues in the House, please join me in honoring the First Congregational Church on its 150th anniversary, and may the church continue to prosper.

COMMEMORATING THE 29TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE MARYLAND STATE ASSOCIATION OF B'NAI B'RITH

HON. BENJAMIN L. CARDIN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, Saturday, February 24, 1990, marks the 29th anniversary of the Maryland State Association of B'nai B'rith.

B'nai B'rith is the world's oldest and largest service organization, setting an example of community service for 147 years.

As we all know, organizations such as B'nai B'rith are able to do so much good because of dedicated and exceptional members. One such individual, Harold Kuperberg, will be inducted as the new president of the Maryland State Association of B'nai B'rith on Saturday. Mr. Kuperberg is a past president of the Menorah Lodge of B'nai B'rith, a lodge with a history of 74 years of community service.

Mr. Kuperberg will succeed Stuart Goldman who is completing a distinguished 1-year term as President.

Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to call the 29th anniversary of the Maryland State Association of B'nai B'rith to the attention of the House. With service organizations such as B'nai B'rith and individuals like those being honored, our work as public servants in Congress is made that much easier and that much more pleasurable.

TRIBUTE TO THE HALL OF FAME INDUCTEE OF THE TRUMBULL AFRO-AMERICAN ACHIEVERS ASSOCIATION

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute today to the Hall of Fame inductees of the Trumbull Afro-American Achievers Association of my 17th Congressional District of Ohio.

The Trumbull Afro-American Achievers Association was established last year and this is the first year the association inducts people into its Hall of Fame. The association serves a dual purpose. First, it honors Afro-Americans from Trumbull County who have excelled in a variety of fields. Second, it serves as an example to the youth of Trumbull County, to prove that they can achieve their goals no matter what the odds are.

I would like to recognize the following persons, and their outstanding accomplishments, for being inducted into the Trumbull Afro-American Association:

Rev. Julie Brogdon, Ph.D. and clergy; Willie Davenport, gold medalist, track; Ross Browner, player in the NFL; Dave Rodgers, played for the Philadelphia Eagles and businessman; Jeanne Kate, professor of zoology; Rev. Ronald Fowlis, clergy; Dennis Dowdell, community service and urban league; John Winfrey, labor; Paul Warfield, member of the NFL Hall of Fame and businessman; Ernie Shavers, boxing; Julia Browner, mother of professional NFL player; Joe Reed, community service; Bogan Reed, state official; Robert Dean, community service; Louie Tabor, Educator; William Blakely, Who's Who in business; Steven Minter, Who's Who; Dr. Roger Bryant, dentist; Paul Gore, military; Bill White, baseball; Lionel Reed, coach and educator; Clifford Johnson, first black high school principal; Carol Hooks, first black junior high principal; L. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to pay tribute to these outstanding individuals. They are all extraordinary people who are models not only for the youth of Trumbull County but also for the rest of us.

TRIBUTE TO JAMES R. HOWARD

HON. C. THOMAS McMILLEN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. McMILLEN of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to an exceptional member of my district who has proven the power of human will over adversity. On February 4 of this year, James R. Howard became an Eagle Scout. Given that only 1 percent of the young men who join scouting reach the Eagle level, that is an accomplishment in itself. But Jimmy Howard achieved this despite suffering from Down's syndrome. He is the first "special Scout" in Maryland to reach Eagle.

His drive for the rank has not been a sheltered one either. He is self-sufficient, contributes to society, and upholds the tenets of Scouting. Every Scout completes many projects—one of Jimmy's was to oversee the planting of 300 pine trees, a testimony to his strong will, care, and respect for nature. This is just one of his many feats.

James Howard has been working toward this goal for the 11 years as a founding member of Troop 216. Now, after 21 badges and a great deal of work for the community, he has joined the elite ranks of Eagle Scout. I hope many will benefit from the marvelous example he provides us all. This is a man who gives to all; and so I ask my colleagues to join me in recognizing this fellow citizen for his strength and dedication.

A TRIBUTE TO LORRAINE ASSELIN MOYNIHAN

HON. RONALD K. MACHTLEY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. MACHTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize and congratulate one of Rhode Island's outstanding young citizens, Lorraine Asselin Moynihan.

Ms. Moynihan, a resident of Woonsocket, RI, has been chosen as one of 1990's Outstanding Young Persons by the Rhode Island Jaycees. Ms. Moynihan is being honored for her dedicated and outstanding community service for the people of Rhode Island for almost 20 years. She has also been recently selected as Greater Woonsocket's Young Person of the Year for her contributions to the community.

Beginning in 1973 as a volunteer on crisis hotline, Ms. Moynihan has demonstrated her genuine caring and concern for others in her community through her active involvement in several public and private organizations devoted to helping those in need. She is a member of Mothers Against Drunk Driving and the Rhode Island Women's Caucus. She also participates in the Rhode Island Coalition for Children's Rights, the Rape Crisis Center and the ROAD Crisis Intervention Hotline. Her outstanding record in her community endeavours also helped place her on Woonsocket Task Forces for Battered Women and Their Children and for the education department's study on kindergarten children. Currently, Ms. Moynihan is serving her second term as a member of Woonsocket's School Committee and has been chosen as chairman of the committee.

It is with great pleasure that I congratulate Ms. Moynihan for her years of dedicated community service and for her selection as one of Rhode Island's Outstanding Young Persons. Through her tireless effots she has sought to improve her city's image and schools. Her devotion to her community is a tribute to her concern for others and serves as a model I hope others follow.

THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL TO EXPAND HEAD START

HON. JOHN MILLER

OF WASHINGTON

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, today I rise in support of the President's budget proposal to expand Head Start. The President's goal is for every child to start school ready to learn by the year 2000. Expansion of this program is a solid start in this direction. Head Start works. It not only prepares children for learning by meeting their health and nutritional needs, it socializes them and helps them develop their values, while involving parents in their children's education. Head Start builds self-esteem and school success, reduces the likelihood that poor youngsters will grow up to become jobless and hopeless.

Head Start currently only serves a fraction of those who are eligible. This budget request would expand the program so that we can reach 70 percent of the Nation's disadvantaged 4-year-olds. There is a dynamic Head Start Program in Kitsap County, in my district. These children have hope. Parents are becoming more and more involved. But it hurts to realize that 77 percent of the eligible children are not served. Head Start is designed to help the disadvantaged child get a better start in life, and it makes a profound difference in the life of that child. I am proud that our President has so clearly demonstrated their support of this worthwhile program. It's one of the wisest investments we can make.

LOYAL ORDER OF THE MOOSE LODGE NO. 992 DISPOSES OF OLD GLORY

HON. BILL PAXON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. PAXON. Mr. Speaker, during the first session, the Supreme Court decision permitting the desecration of the American flag was a hotly debated issue.

Regardless of any Member's position on the proposals for a constitutional amendment to prohibit desecration of the flag, I am certain that we all share the same respect for Old Glory.

When Old Glory becomes too old—faded and torn after years of proudly representing this country—it is traditional and accepted practice to dispose of the flag by burning it in a respectful manner.

The Loyal Order of the Moose Lodge No. 992, located in Hamburg, NY, will accept American flags from any and all sources around the country that are in such condition that it is no longer appropriate to display them, and will dispose of them in a fitting ceremony each year on Memorial Day.

American flags can be sent to the Hamburg Moose Lodge No. 992, 55 Church Street, Hamburg, NY 14075.

Any assistance that my colleagues can provide in disseminating this information to individuals and groups in your district would be most appreciated.

I request, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution of the Hamburg Lodge No. 992 of the Loyal Order of the Moose be inserted into the RECORD at this point:

RESOLUTION

Be it resolved that we the members and officers of the Hamburg Moose Lodge No. 992 Hamburg, N.Y., in the spirit of our organization, which is dedicated to protect, nurture and guarantee the freedom of our brothers and their families from childhood through their Golden years hereby approve the following proclamation,

WHEREAS; The Loyal Order of Moose is an organization whose community spirit and patriotism are deeply rooted in our organizational structure and which is dedicated to the belief that all men deserve the blessings and privileges of freedom and the opportunity to worship, each in his own way, AND;

WHEREAS; We the members of the Loyal Order of Moose feel that our Flag, as the National symbol of this freedom must be Protected, Revered and Honored in a manner befitting those lofty ideals which are held so dearly by our brothers do this date issue the following proclamation:

We the members and officers of the Hamburg Lodge No. 992, Loyal Order of Moose, do here-by invite any and all citizens, persons, and organizations whether it-be religious, patriotic, political, social, fraternal, public or private who presently have or will have in their possession, a Flag of the United States of America in which condition it is no longer proper to display, to send that Flag to the Hamburg Moose Lodge No. 992, 55 Church St., Hamburg, N.Y. 14075 in order to assure that the proper respect be given to this symbol of Liberty upon its disposition, at a fitting ceremony held on or about each Memorial Day.

This ceremony to lay at rest, those Flags which have proudly proclaimed our dedication to Liberty and Freedom as our National symbol, shall be a part of the Memorial Day Parade ceremonies held each year in the Village of Hamburg, N.Y.

Approved by the Board of Officers of Hamburg Lodge No. 992, Loyal Order of Moose on July 25, 1989.

Duly adopted by the membership of Hamburg Lodge No. 992, Loyal Order of Moose at a regularly scheduled meeting on July 25, 1989.

ROGER A. BECKER,
Governor.
FRANK BABSTER,
Secretary.

GLOBAL WARMING

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, Beth Miller, a constituent of mine from Santa Fe, NM, has been extremely active in addressing the problems of global warming. Following an appeal by the Sol y Sombra Foundation and Beth Miller, to Presidents Bush and Gorbachev before the Malta summit that they jointly address this significant issue, the two Presidents did discuss this important matter at Malta and are committed to joint action to focus international attention on this key problem.

Mr. Speaker, sometimes individual citizens can make a difference.

SOL Y SOMBRA FOUNDATION,
Santa Fe, New Mexico, January, 1990.

Last August I had the privilege of attending a conference in Sundance, Utah, sponsored by Robert Redford's organization, Institute for Resource Management, on the critical topic "Global Warming." It was a joint U.S.-U.S.S.R. conference which brought together scientists, environmentalists, politicians and business leaders to discuss, in depth, the significance of global climate change for all people of the world.

One of the conclusive events of the conference was a letter from participants to Presidents Bush and Gorbachev, calling for joint action to address this significant issue.

During the recent Malta Summit, it was my great pleasure to support, through the Sol y Sombra Foundation and the Windstar Foundation, an ad in the New York Times which reissued the letter to Presidents Bush and Gorbachev. A copy of the ad is enclosed for you to see.

In a surprising reversal of recent policy, President Bush announced at Malta that the United States would sponsor a meeting in 1990 to study global climate change. Also, the U.S. Congress has announced plans to host an international conference of legislators in 1990 on environmental issues and, particularly, global warming. While it is not clear what impact the meeting at Sundance, and its resultant letter, had in the debate on this subject, I feel blessed with the opportunity to contribute in any small way.

For that reason, I call your personal attention to this and ask you to commit some effort in 1990 toward seeing the debate expanded and extended. A small effort by many will bring a powerful force to work for the good of our planet.

Respectively,

BETH MILLER,
President.

[From the New York Times, Sunday, Dec. 3, 1989]

AN OPEN LETTER TO OUR PRESIDENTS

Our world is changing at a staggering rate. As old walls crumble, new alliances emerge and with them, new hope for our future.

As leaders of the two nations who, in their rivalry, have kept the world on edge, you have both the opportunity and the responsibility to help the world craft a new way of looking at the planet that will guide us safely into the next century.

We need a new concept of international security that recognizes the need for environmental stability.

The Malta meeting is an historic opportunity. As you focus in your informal discussions on recent political events in Eastern Europe and elsewhere, don't forget that our future will ultimately be determined, not only by how we treat one another, but also how we treat the life support systems of the planet.

In August, the Institute for Resource Management and the Soviet Academy of Sciences convened a diverse group of U.S. and Soviet leaders in Sundance, Utah to discuss Global Climate Change. The following is a public reprint of a letter to both of you from many of the individuals who gathered in Sundance. We urge both our nations to demonstrate leadership on this important issue.

AUGUST 26, 1989.

GEORGE BUSH,
President
MIKHAIL GORBACHEV,
Chairman, Supreme Soviet.

Recognizing the commitment you have pledged toward the environment, we wish to send you the conclusions from a symposium held at Sundance, Utah, convened by the Institute for Resource Management and the Soviet Academy of Sciences.

A symposium of American and Soviet scientists, policy-makers, environmentalists, industry leaders and artists met to discuss bilateral action on perhaps our planet's gravest environmental problem: global climate change.

The improved relations between the two powers have created new opportunities for joint efforts to reduce the possibility of catastrophic global climate change. The USA and the USSR are the two largest producers of greenhouse gases. The USSR and the USA are also the two principal sources of the world's scientific knowledge which can be deployed to restrain global greenhouse emissions. Therefore, we should provide the leadership in the search for common solutions to the global warming problem, as well as for the environmental security of the world.

The Sundance Symposium arrived at four specific recommendations which we hope you will consider and support. We believe the struggle for the prevention of greenhouse gases should be raised to the level of international security. We propose the formation of an environmental security alliance between our two countries. We further propose our two nations work together on these four top priorities:

To promote energy technologies which are both cost-effective and non-polluting by enlisting the appropriate existing agencies in the two countries.

To phase-out the production and use of all CFCs as rapidly as possible, and no later than the year 2000, and to substantially reduce CO_2 and the remaining greenhouse gases.

To reduce the rate of deforestation worldwide, and initiate reforestation efforts by enlisting the appropriate existing agencies in the two countries.

To create citizen participation in the above efforts through a series of joint educational programs and by a direct appeal for action by each head of state.

We realize the success of these initiatives lies in engaging the efforts of all citizens. We stand ready to assist you in educating the public, as we were educated by the Native Americans who opened our conference.

"We do not inherit the land from our ancestors, we borrow it from our children."

Respectfully yours,

PRESIDENT BUSH LUKEWARM ON WARMING

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, one of the most disappointing aspects of the Bush administration has been the gap between the President's campaign rhetoric on the subject of environment and his administration's weak performance in this area. Especially in the extremely important area of the problem of global warming, the President has been backing away from what environmentalists hoped he would be doing. The recent speech which he gave on this subject was far less than we had a right to expect, and bespeaks a timidity on this critical issue that could well have negative consequences for the ability of the world to combat one of the threats that faces it. Along with a hesitant posture on clear air, the President showed retreat on the matter of global warming calls undue serious question the President's pledges in the environmental area. The questions of clean air and global warming are not peripheral: They're obviously essential to the health of the planet and the people who live on it. President Bush has been disappointing in this regard so far. Mr. Speaker, to underline the failure of the President to deliver as his campaign had many to expect that he would, I ask that an article from the February 7 Boston Globe by Randolph Ryan be printed here. In it, Mr. Ryan ultimately makes clear the shortcomings of the President's approach in the critical area of global warming:

[From the Boston Globe, Feb. 7, 1990]

LUKEWARM ON WARMING

(By Randolph Ryan)

If there were a single sphere of statesmanship in which President Bush could put an original, urgently needed stamp on history, it would be in mobilizing a world-wide effort to stop the fouling of the planet. The president's limp speech on Monday to a UN conference on that subject shows distressing limits as a leader for these times.

The most serious manifestation of environmental deterioration is man-made global warming. The world looks to America for environmental leadership. We are a rich nation with the technological capacity to seek cures. Also, because our economy is a huge consumer of energy, especially of oil and coal, we are the greatest generator of "greenhouse" gases such as carbon dioxide.

Although our factory stacks may have scrubbers, we are still The Great Polluter. None of the other contributors to the greenhouse effect—including the sulfurous, inefficient industries of the Eastern bloc and the slashers-and-burners of tropical rain forests—have as great a responsibility to face this issue as do Americans.

As a philosophical conservative, as a doting grandfather, and as an intelligent and moderate man, Bush cannot be oblivious to the need for his generation to protect the interests of those to come. Yet this environmental president who professes appealing boyish devotion to natural wonders like "the wily bonefish"—and who at every opportunity uses his grandchildren as props—seems either to have choked because the challenge is too daunting or to have taken a dive because his noblesse oblige is only skin deep.

Environmental degradation, scarcely noticed a decade ago, now looms over everyone's grandchildren. Sen. Al Gore said the three causes of global warming are manmade and can be affected by public policy: rampant population growth (which some of Bush's supporters ignore on religious principle), the collision of industrial civilization with the ecology, and "an old way of thinking about Earth, as old as Aristotle, which defines man as separate from nature and entitled to exploit it."

There is uncertainty over the rate of change and about some complexities of global chemistry not easily modeled in labs. But scientists agree that the process is sharply accelerating, that it could become irreversible in as little as 50 years, and that, if unchecked, it is likely to have catastrophic effects.

After picking good people for environmental posts, Bush has ignored what they are telling him. Last May, on the eve of an important international conference, he allowed the testimony of a top government scientist to be altered to make the threat seem less serious.

That was comparable in spirit to falsifying intelligence estimates to find light-at-the-end-of-the-tunnel in a deepening war.

Last fall Bush blocked a timetable to begin carbon dioxide curbs, thereby sabotaging another international conference in Holland. On Monday, he eliminated from his text a considered call to action that had been agreed upon by the State Department, the Department of Energy and the Environmental Protection Agency. He managed to avoid even saying "greenhouse effect" and "global warming."

Neither greenhouse effect nor the other "spaceship Earth" issues—ozone hole, nuclear waste, chemicals, garbage—are going away, and they are each daunting in their own right. What must make them particularly painful for Bush is that solutions are inconceivable without two things that are anathema to many of his supporters: an increasing degree of social planning on a world-wide scale, and the necessity for the haves (both the well-off within individual societies and the well-off nations in the wider world) to provide a good example.

Perhaps President Bush did not realize the requirements needed to fill his job: the courage of conviction, the determination to take on an uncertain battle, and the willingness to demonstrate self-sacrifice.

If so, that is sad. Age-old habits have to be broken. A truer kind of conservatism is required that stands not merely for securing of privilege but for preservation of what is of value from the past.

A TRIBUTE TO ERNESTO ALONSO—MR. AMIGO 1989

HON. SOLOMON P. ORTIZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. ORTIZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend and pay tribute to Mr. Ernesto Alonso, the newly selected Mr. Amigo.

Every year, members of the Mr. Amigo Association, who represent the city of Brownsville, TX, travel to Mexico City to select a new Mr. Amigo to serve as honored guest of Charro Days festivities in Brownsville, TX. Charro Days is a 4-day international event in which the United States and Mexico are joined in celebration of the cultures of these neighboring countries. During Charro Days, which originated as a pre-Lenten festival, Brownsville citizens participate in a series of parades, dances and parties to demonstrate the goodwill of both countries. It is a well planned, major function which is enjoyed and eagerly anticipated by many south Texans as well as our winter visitors.

Mr. Ernesto Alonso is the 26th Mexican citizen to be honored by the Mr. Amigo Association. He was born in Aguascalientes, Mexico. At a very young age, he demonstrated his artistic abilities in an experimental theater group in which he acted and directed. He later went on to make his theater debut in 1939 at the famous National Theater of Fine Arts in Mexico City, Mexico. This prominence triggered the next major step in his career when he went on to appear in his first national movie debut where he costarred with the famous actress, Sara Garcia in 1941, in the movie "La Gallina Culeca."

From early on in his career, he has been fortunate to star in and direct many movies and theater plays. He filmed over 60 movies, among them, Luis Bunuel's "Ensayo de un Crimen," which featured the legendary Miroslava. This film is considered one of Bunuel's most widely acclaimed.

In the theater, he has obtained outstanding triumphs with over 1,500 starring roles. As a producer, he contributed a historical perspective to Mexican and Latin American classical television soap operas. Mr. Alonso has received awards from all over the world of this exceptional, landmark, and artistic work.

The prestigious Mr. Amigo designate is selected on the basis of his or her contribution to international friendship and development of mutual understanding and cooperation between Mexico and the United States. Mr. Alonso should not only be recognized for his fine acting, producing, and directing abilities, but more importantly for his contributions to international friendship and the evolution of the film industry in his native country of Mexico. These contributions have merited the respect and admiration of citizens in both the United States and Mexico. It is for these reasons that Mr. Ernesto Alonso is an excellent choice for this year's award.

As Mr. Amigo, Ernesto Alonso will receive the red-carpet treatment when he visits Brownsville as the city's honored guest during the upcoming Charro Days celebration. During his 3-day stay on the border, he will make personal appearances in the Charro Days parades and at other fiesta events. Official welcome receptions will be staged by organizations in Cameron County, TX, and the cities of Brownsville, TX and Matamoros, Mexico. Mr. Alonso will also be the special guest at the Mr. Amigo Association luncheon and the President's party.

I ask my colleagues to join me in extending congratulations to Ernesto Alonso for being honored with this special award.

TRIBUTE TO FLORENCE SMITH

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to Florence Smith, a volunteer coordinator and a member of my Central Brooklyn Martin Luther King Commission, who for the last 2 years has worked with high schools in my congressional district in an effort to encourage the students' involvement with the National Bicentennial Competition on the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

The 3-year-old competition is sponsored by the Commission on the Bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution and funded by an act of Congress. It is the most extensive educational program of its kind in the United States, featuring an extensive 6-week curriculum that provides students with a fundamental knowledge of the Constitution, the Bill of Rights, and the principles and values they embody. Winners of the congressional districts' competitions in each State go to the statewide contests. The champions of the States' contests compete in a national event.

Ms. Smith has worked diligently with the high school students from my district to prepare them for the rigorous sessions in which contestants must instantly answer one of three questions in six issue areas: political philosophy; historical background on the Constitution; the process involved in writing the Constitution; the establishment of the U.S. Government; fundamental rights of Americans under the Bill of Rights; and the responsibilities of citizens. This process is part of the local, State, and national competition, although the questions vary at each level, and the students are only allotted a short amount of time in which to answer these questions and follow-up questions by the judges.

Thanks in large measure to the work of Ms. Smith, a retired high school English teacher and college admissions counselor from Brooklyn who has also taught English at Tuskegee University and South Carolina State College, students competing from Clara Barton High School in my district became the New York City area champions in the National Bicentennial Competition last year and this year. New York City winners go on to the New York State competition in Albany, NY, which this year will be held on February 24.

The National Bicentennial Competition on the Constitution and the Bill of Rights affords an excellent opportunity for students to come to know the Constitution and the Bill of Rights as living documents and to develop skills necessary for their future as adult participants in civil and democratic action. Ms. Smith's role in preparing the high school students in my district for this competition ensures that these young people will have a far greater understanding of their rights and responsibilities as U.S. citizens, and of these two highly important documents which protect those rights. Ms. Smith is a sterling example of a dedicated, committed educator and I appreciate her outstanding service as the coordinator of the competition in my district, and the trainer of academic champions from among the high schools in central Brooklyn.

HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 259, THE HARVEST OF PEACE RESOLUTION

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Concurrent Resolution 259, the harvest of peace resolution, of which I am an enthusiastic cosponsor.

This resolution is no apple pie in the sky dream. It sets a commonsense goal—reordering of our national priorities to put the needs of people once again at the center of our Government's concern. It contains prudent steps for achieving that goal.

It calls for negotiating verifiable and substantial arms reduction agreements with the Soviet Union: Not for unilateral disarmament. It calls for helping defense industries and their employees to convert to productive nondefense work recognizing that the conversion to a true peacetime economy will cause disruptions which will hurt some of our communities in the short run. And it does not call for meeting the basic human needs by spending money we do not have; it recognizes the requirement that the budget deficit be reduced.

Last year, I opposed the Defense authorization bill because it ducked the tough choices. By including billions for the strategic defense intitiative [SDI], and both the MX and Midgetman program, it kept us on the road of acquiring weapons systems we do not need at ever-escalating costs we can not afford.

The remarkable political developments in Europe since then have made it even clearer that we must reorder our budgetary priorities.

Over 40 years ago we faced and met one of the major challenges of our 200 years of experience. That challenge was feeding the hungry in war-ravaged regions, rebuilding a devastated Europe, promoting and nurturing democracy in Germany, Japan, and Italy, and protecting the West from the threat of Soviet aggression. The successes we are now enjoying are the fruits of sacrifices we made.

It would be pleasant, if in the afterglow of the good news from Europe and in view of the dramatic improvement in United States-Soviet relations, we could relax, take it easy, and forget our domestic and global responsibilities.

However, the decline in our schools, the decay of our highways and bridges, and the increase in poverty and homelessness in our communities will not be reversed unless we reorder our priorities. If we fail to invest in programs to reverse this decline, our productivity and our economic competitiveness will be eroded as well.

Our Nation's strength depends not only on a sturdy defense, but in meeting the needs of our people so that they can contribute to the growth of a healthy society and a robust economy.

Moreover, our justifiable pride in the growth of democracy throughout the world should not be an occasion for mere self-congratulation, but a reminder that our engagement and our assistance can make a difference.

Last year, as chairman of the Hunger Committee's Working Group on Central America, I and several of my colleagues, developed legislation to target assistance to the urgent health needs of war victims in that region—legislation which I am pleased to note was enacted. But much remains to be done in Central America and throughout the developing world.

This resolution calls, on a global basis, for increased assistance to developing nations to overcome hunger and poverty, to ensure sustainable development, and to promote human rights and the people's participation in the political decisions affecting them. It reflects some of the concerns of the Hunger Committee's International Task Force which has begun to scrutinize the AID budget and its priorities to determine the extent to which they adequately address the problems of food production, hunger and malnutrition, and primary health care and child survival.

Mr. Speaker, my own view is that the harvest of peace resolution is not only worthy of our support today, but should be kept before us tomorrow and in the months ahead as a guide for reordering our national priorities. Eliminating hunger must always head our agenda.

FRANCES ROSSMAN

HON. BILL SCHUETTE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. SCHUETTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize Frances Rossman, who has served as the executive secretary of the Home Life Department of the Veterans of Foreign Wars National Home in Eaton Rapids, MI, for 40 years.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars National Home which is a complex of 36 cottages that provide living quarters to the children and single parent families of deceased and disabled U.S. veterans. It is the only one of its kind in the country. Frances Rossman has been an intricate factor in the success of this unique and valuable service to the veterans of our country.

Frances, who started working for the VFW in 1949 as a typist, has made many contributions to the VFW. In her 40 years of service, during which she has seen 8 executive directors, 1,462 children, and a host of other people, she has remained the one constant at the national home.

Mrs. Rossman makes sure that she meets every child who comes through the home, even though she has three children, four grandchildren, and two great-grandchildren of her own scattered throughout the country. Mrs. Rossman, who considers those at the home to be her extended family, still manages to keep in touch with many of the children that attended the home through the years.

Mr. Speaker, and my colleagues in the House, please join me in honoring Frances Rossman for her hard work and dedication to the VFW.

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. BENJAMIN L. CARDIN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my support for the celebration of Lithuanian Independence Day. I hope my colleagues will join me in paying tribute to a proud people and their heroic struggle for independence.

This day is a symbol of hope for all Lithuanian Americans and for those who continue the independence crusade in Lithuania. Their efforts and hopes have earned the admiration and recognition of the American people.

After hundreds of years of unstable governments and domination by Poland, Russia, and Germany, the Lithuanian Council declared the country an independence state in 1918.

Despite a peace treaty between Lithuania and Russia signed on July 12, 1920, proclaiming the nation independent, the Lithuanian people once again found themselves under Russian rule in 1940 when the Soviet Union annexed Lithuanian as a constituent Republic of the U.S.S.R.

Continuing its noble fight for human freedom, the Lithuanian Communist Party voted December 20 to become independent from Moscow in defiance by warnings by Mikhail Gorbachev and the Soviet Politburo.

Prodemocracy changes sweeping the Baltic region are especially visible in Lithuanian as historic elections are scheduled to take place February 24.

I am honored to represent the many Lithuanians in the Third Congressional District of Maryland. I know they will continue their independence fight, and I am proud to join them by marking this very important day.

TRIBUTE TO D.W. "BUD" RICHARDS AND ALLAN EWING

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to D.W. "Bud" Richards and Allan Ewing of my 17th Congressional District of Ohio, both of whom are retiring from their respective positions in the Canfield School District.

Mr. Richards is retiring after 40 years as the director of transportation from the school district and is a life-long resident of Canfield, OH. After graduating from Canfield High School, Bud entered the Army and was stationed in West Germany. In 1956, he received an honorable discharge. He and his wife Barbara have two sons, Dan and Mike, as well as two grandsons.

Mr. Ewing is retiring after 25 years as the bus mechanic for the Canfield School District. Like Mr. Richards, Allan grew up in Canfield and attended Canfield schools. Mr. Ewing is an army veteran who received an honorable discharge in 1956. He and his wife, Esther, have two sons, Bill and Tom, and a daughter, Amy. The Ewings have five grandchildren.

Mr. Richards and Mr. Ewing have a combined 65 years of service to the Canfield School District. They are dedicated and dependable employees who have given much to the Canfield school system. Both men will be greatly missed by the students, faculty, and administration of the Canfield School District.

Both of these dedicated men have given much to their community, especially to the young people of the Canfield schools. I am truly honored to represent two such outstanding individuals.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO ALLOW STATES TO ACQUIRE USED FEDERAL PROPERTY BEFORE FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to allow States to acquire used Federal property, before foreign governments. Unfortunately, under current law, the Secretary of Defense has the authority to provide choice Federal property, no longer needed by DOD, to foreign governments before other Federal departments and agencies or States have the opportunity to utilize it.

Under the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 as amended, when property is determined to be excess, or no longer required by the Federal agency which owns the property, it is screened by other Federal agencies for possible use. Once it is no longer required by the Federal Government, it becomes surplus, and may be donated to State agencies for distribution to local governments, nonprofit educational or public health institutions, medical institutions, hospitals, clinics, health centers, schools, colleges, universities, schools for the mentally retarded, schools for the physically handicapped, child care centers, and other such institutions.

The purpose of this distribution is to extend the use of property paid for by the U.S. taxpayer to promote conservation, economic development, education, the development of parks and recreation, public health and public safety. Unfortunately, before much of this property is made available to other Federal departments and agencies as excess, much less to States as surplus, it is diverted for use by foreign governments.

An amendment to the Fiscal Year 1986 Defense Authorization Act authorized the Secretary of Defense to make available for humanitarian relief purposes any nonlethal excess property of the Department of Defense. Such property is then transferred to the Department of State for foreign distribution.

To date, I have been unsuccessful in obtaining annual reports on the disposition of all excess property transferred under this authority by DOD. According to a December 15, 1989, factsheet, the General Services Administration has also had significant difficulty determining the amounts of excess property transferred to the Humanitarian Assistance Program. According to the factsheet, "the only summary data which we have been able to obtain are * * * figures that were informally furnished by the Defense Logistics Agency." These figures show that between fiscal year 1986 and fiscal year 1989, 56,936 line items were transferred at an acquisition cost of $50,553,108, and that the amount transferred has steadily increased each year.

The factsheet also reveals that not only has the amount of property transferred under this authority increased, but the number of countries receiving the property has increased. According to GSA, when DOD initially received the authority, property was transferred mainly in Afghanistan and Cambodia. More recently, however, excess DOD property has been transferred to Bangladesh, Paraguay, Argentina, Gambia, Chad, Soviet Armenia, El Salvador, Panama, Equatorial Guinea, Liberia, Uruguay, North Yemen, Sao Tome, Sierra Leone, and the Philippines. Such property has included jackets, blankets, medical supplies, trucks, front loaders, graders, and construction equipment.

As a result, State agencies charged with distributing Federal surplus property have complained that much of the choice property is removed from the process before they have the ability to acquire it. I beleive that this property should be fully utilized at home, to address our needs, before it is made available to others. My bill simply repeals the authority provided the Secretary of Defense to make available excess property for foreign distribution, and makes surplus property available for foreign humanitarian assistance only after all eligible domestic entities have had the ability to acquire and utilize the property.

I urge my colleagues, who believe as I do that U.S. taxpayers should have the ability to fully benefit from the property they purchase before any foreign government may benefit, to cosponsor my bill.

IF CONGRESS CAN'T CUT THIS . . .

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, one of the more dubious proposed expenditures of scarce Federal resources is the pending expansion of the ground wave emergency network—series of towers that are intended to help us fight a nuclear war after the initial attacks. I believe that the United States continues to have a need for a reasonable nuclear deterrent, but the case for this expansion of the GWEN system, which was always shaky, has become even more so in light of the changed events in the world. One need not believe the Mikhail Gorbachev is a secret member of the American Friends Service Committee to understand that fundamental changes are taking place in the Soviet Union as a matter of economic necessity which allow us not to disarm unilaterally, but to reduce the level of expenditures on our deterrent.

These proposed new towers are not only expensive; in many cases they will be environmentally damaging. Air Force proposals to extend this system in some location in Southeastern Massachusetts or Rhode Island have caused legitimate concern by residents of that area who fear for the environmental disruption that these towers will inevitably produce. And, unfortunately, the Federal Environmental Protection Administration has proven unwilling to act in defense of the citizens against this threat to their environment.

Mr. Speaker, the accompanying article from the New York Times by Ronald Fraser makes a very cogent case against the continuation of this expenditure, which is both wasteful and environmentally unsound. I hope that the President will heed this suggestion and put these plans on hold, and I hope that, no matter what he does, we will act in the budget that will be before us this spring to prevent the extension of this unnecessary and disruptive system.

[From the New York Times]

IF CONGRESS CAN'T CUT THIS . . .

(By Ronald Fraser)

WASHINGTON.—As Congress takes up debate on the Pentagon budget, the members should think a moment about the confused people in Chelsea, Wis., Lovingston, Va., and dozens of other communities. These people are having trouble squaring the apparent end of the cold war with the Air Force's continuing preparations for a retaliatory nuclear strike.

They can't quite reconcile 300-foot-high military towers sprouting in their backyards with President Bush's expressions of sympathy for Mikhail Gorbachev's political plight. Nor can they reconcile the towers with a recent proposal by Secretary of Defense Dick Cheney; the recommendation—quickly rejected by Mr. Bush—was to ground the President's airborne command center because the likelihood of a Soviet sneak attack is so remote.

Known as the ground wave emergency network, the Air Force program consists of a two-part network of relay towers stretching from Maine to California. The towers are designed to survive electromagnetic-pulse disruptions during the first 15 minutes of a Soviet nuclear sneak attack. If the primary military channels to Air Force land-based missiles and nuclear-armed bombers were cut, it would serve as a backup means to transmit Pentagon retaliation attack orders.

The network symbolizes the fate of many yet-to-be-built 80's-era weapons that, in Pentagonese, have been overtaken by events." When these weapons were conceived, the Evil Empire was expected to last well into the next century.

If Congress is truly looking to carve out a "peace dividend" from the military budget, it might start here, with these small, often-overlooked programs. After that, it might be easier to extend the same logic to the larger weapons systems, such as the B-2 bomber and the Strategic Defense Initiative, which account for a much greater share of military spending.

The ground wave emergency network is rooted in President Ronald Reagan's 1981 National Security Decision Directive 12, which calls for a communications system that could survive a nuclear attack. A crude stop-gap measure, the network is to be replaced by a sophisticated satellite communications system in the late 1990's.

The Air Force is only now completing the first phase, a self-contained 56-tower network linking the Pentagon to bomber and missile command centers. The second phase, consisting of 40 more relay towers, is still on the drawing board.

People living in the shadow of the proposed second-phase towers wonder why, with peace breaking out across Europe, the Air Force needs 40 more towers. The Air Force's response: for insurance, in case an enemy destroys some of the first 56.

Actually, how many towers are enough was never resovled. In hearings before Congress in 1983, Donald Latham, then the Assistant Secretary of Defense of Command, Control and Communications, put the issue this way, in typical bureaucratese:

"How much survivability do you want to buy? . . . We can cover and get connectivity across the continental United States with about 45 nodes [towers]. But that is not enough if I really look at cutting up this network with a few weapons or a few terrorist attacks. . . . How many nodes do you want in order to give you absolute assurance? I don't know the right answer to that. It is some number more than 45 and less than 500."

If Mr. Latham couldn't decide how many towers are enough while the cold war was still hot, how can the Air Force know the right number in this new postwar era? Uncertainty abounds. No one really knows whether an electromagnetic impulse would be a big problem or not in a nuclear war. So the value of the towers will always be speculative.

Besides, even if the impulse did temporarily disrupt communications with U.S. bombers and land-based missiles, that would hardly leave us defenseless. The President could retaliate with the 3,000 nuclear warheads aboard the 20 or so submarines we keep at sea at all times. These subs are invulnerable to Soviet attacks, and most experts agree that a few thousand surviving warheads would deter a first strike by the Soviet Union.

Yet, the Air Force persists in upseting one community after another in its search for sites for the next 40 towers. And the illogic is stunning. Officials insist the towers are essential to U.S. security, even as current events descredit this rationale. Then they turn around and tell local folks not to worry, the chances are slim that this critical communications system would become a target for Soviet missiles in an all-out war. The people living near the towers are not so sure.

At $1.1 million a tower, the program is small potatoes compared with other too-late-for-the-war weapons, like the B-2 bombers, at $530 million apiece. But far more than money is at stake here. In any bureaucracy, momentum tends to keep programs going long after they have lost their reason for being.

Now that our need for a big insurance policy to retaliate against a Soviet sneak attack is on a downward slide, what should become of the half-finished communications system?

Why not put the last 40 towers on hold, leaving the 56-tower system in place and ready to use, if needed? Why not wait and see if the $60 million insurance policy is really needed?

The real challenge posed by this program is plain. Congress needs to display the common sense to cancel a small, interim cold war insurance policy that has been overcome by events. If it can't do that, what are the chances that it will create a real peace dividend by halting the more costly cold war weapons that we no longer need?

JIM McGUIRE

HON. BILL SCHUETTE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. SCHUETTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in recognition of Jim McGuire, of Cadillac, MI.

Mr. McGuire, who has been the general manager of McGuire's Resort in Cadillac since 1977, was named Michigan Hotelier of the Year in 1989. He received this award for his service, leadership, and exemplary professionalism in the Michigan lodging industry, as well as for his outstanding and numerous contributions to the community.

Mr. McGuire is a member of the Kiwanis Club, the West Michigan Tourist Association, the Cadillac Area Chamber of Commerce, and the Ferris State University Hospitality Advisory Board.

This past summer Mr. McGuire was also selected by the Office of Service to the Aging to receive it's "Distinguished Employer of the Year" award for his commitment and dedication to employing older workers. Jim McGuire is truly an asset to the State of Michigan and he makes living in, and visiting, Michigan more enjoyable.

THE PRESENT STATE OF AFFAIRS IN ROMANIA

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today because I am concerned about the present state of affairs in Romania. After the December revolution, the National Salvation Front [NSF] took control of Romania as the interim government. The Front pledged that it would stay out of politics after it had guided the Romanian people toward free and fair elections. Yet, on January 23, the Front announced its intention to run candidates in the upcoming national elections.

Other actions taken by the NSF include cancelling a January 28 national referendum to outlaw the communist party and banning all spontaneous demonstrations and threatening protesters with jail sentence of 15 to 30 days and stiff fines.

Despite the Front's avowal to allow 29 other political parties to participate in a coalition government until the national elections, it has practically guaranteed its domination of the coalition through its gerrymandering of seats. Half of the seats in the new 180-member coalition will go to the 30 political parties—each having 3 representatives, 42 will go to a representative from each county, and 48 will go to chosen individual members. If many of the regional and individual seats are filled by members of the Front's regional and national committees, it will retain considerable control of the coalition. One theory, to which we must give serious consideration, expresses the belief that the NSF has loaded up some of the other 29 political parties with its communist clones. They are masquerading under a separate banner, so that the Communists will gain a majority of the seats in the coalition. Such tactics by Communist parties across the world are not without precedent.

The Front has announced that national elections will be held on May 20, which will give it an insurmountable advantage if it participates as a political party because it controls the security forces, administrative organs, and media in Romania. Political parties that have just emerged from obscurity will have no time to organize an effective platform or strategy since the elections are being held at such an early date.

Mr. Speaker, this week I will introduce a bill that will express the sense of Congress that the President send a United States delegation to Romania to monitor the national elections to ensure that they are fair and free. I urge my colleagues to support me in this endeavor. I submit the testimony of Andrei Calciu, son of the famous Romanian freedom fighter, Father Gheorghe Calciu, who recently spent 2 weeks in Romania, studying the situation there. His testimony reveals that the NSF is more concerned with hanging onto power than with the wishes of the Romanian people. It demonstrates why the United States must do everything in its power to ensure that all political parties get a fair shake at winning the national elections.

NATIONAL STUDENT-ATHLETE DAY

HON. C. THOMAS McMILLEN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. McMILLEN of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced legislation to designate April 6, 1990, as "National Student-Athlete Day." I believe the time has come to draw attention to student athletes and attempt to bring into balance academics and sports.

Unfortunately, we have let the imbalance between sports and academics go on for too long. It's time to gain a proper perspective on our priorities. When we sacrifice our educational principles on the altar of competitive sports, we do more than ruin the life of a young man or woman. We send a signal to all young people that thinking skills are less important than athletic skills. And in today's competitive world marketplace, that is not the message the United States should be sending. The commemoration of this day will demonstrate the House's support of a proper balance between athletics and education.

A broad observance of National Student-Athlete Day will help educators promote the role of sports within education and emphasize the need for a balance between school and sports. Special programs are being planned in some States for the day that include professional athletes, who have returned to college to complete their degree, speaking about the importance of an education.

I ask that my colleagues support this measure and promote the spirit of this bill to their young constituents.

NEWPORT COUNTY COMMUNITY MENTAL HEALTH CENTER HONORED

HON. RONALD K. MACHTLEY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. MACHTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor the Newport County Community Mental Health Center and its executive director, Mr. Bud Cicilline.

The Newport County Community Mental Health Center is a community-based agency that offers a wide range of mental health services to the citizens of Rhode Island. Founded in 1964, the center has continually expanded its services and programs for the community. Among the center's accomplishments are Rhode Island's first federally funded comprehensive community mental health center. In 1985, the center created the McKinney Shelter for the Homeless, the Nation's first program for the homeless and mentally ill. In the shelter's early days, only a dozen people were able to receive help but through the hard work of the staff the facilities have been expanded to accommodate more homeless people. The center has also more recently created an outstanding program for children who suffer from emotional illness.

On behalf of the people of Rhode Island, I would like to thank the staff of the Newport County Community Mental Health Center and Mr. Cicilline for their years of service to the people of our State. Their commitment to helping their fellow man is an inspiration to us all.

MILITARY AID TO EL SALVADOR

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I believe today that it is time to reevaluate our policy in El Salvador. A decade has gone by and billions of dollars have been spent in the effort to establish a democracy in that war torn country. Once more, we are confronted with funding a government whose military is admittedly involved in the murder of civilians. Once more, we must ask ourselves the tough question of whether it is right to provide U.S. tax dollars to a death squad supporting military fighting an equally violent leftist guerrilla group. We long for a democracy in El Salvador. So, while our cause is noble, the means to that end appear questionable.

We have tried to turn the Salvadoran military into a force capable enough to defeat the FMLN guerrilla movement. I will have to say that effort has not succeeded. While the recent FMLN offensive was a failure, it still demonstrated that the FMLN continues to grow in strength. But worse than our failure to achieve our military goals is the fact that we have created a monster in the process. The military, supplanting the oligarchy, has become the dominant political player. Corruption runs rampant, with nonexistent soldiers receiving pay and officers running extortion rackets.

We have given the military guns and helicopters, but not taught the responsibility those weapons imply. We have given bullets without an accompanying sense of democratic duty and values. The United States created Salvadoran military is a monster because its ends are only to see itself stronger and more powerful. We hope for a democracy, with armed services who will be that democracies protector. What we get is a military seeking only to protect itself.

While our intentions in El Salvador are good, the means defeat the purpose. Support for the FMLN will disappear when civilians can look to the military for support, not repression. I hope that in the upcoming session we will listen to our past promises of restricting aid if the military does not reform. Or else, I fear that the killing of nuns and Jesuits, opposition candidates and labor organizers, of peasants and merchants will continue. Our constituents support democracy, but not the way we are trying to achieve it. The Salvadoran military must know that the American people and their elected government will not stand for the killing of civilians and political opponents.

FOURTH ANNUAL BLACK ENGINEER OF THE YEAR AWARDS

HON. KWEISI MFUME

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. MFUME. Mr. Speaker, today I again pay tribute to the annual Black Engineer of the Year awards. On February 24, 1990, the fourth Annual Black Engineer of the Year awards conference will take place in Baltimore, MD, to recognize the significant contributions that black engineers have made, and continue to make, to this ever-challenging profesession.

It is most fitting that during Black History Month, the annual awards will take place and recognize, as well as document, the contributions of blacks in education, science, engineering, and technology. Such recognition can also inspire and direct more students toward a career in the exciting field of engineering.

Career Communications Group, Inc.—publishers of U.S. Black Engineer magazine—along with Mobil Corp., the Council of Engineering Deans of historically black colleges and university, and the 1990 selection committee have proudly announced the winners for this year, and I am pleased to pay tribute to the following Black Engineer of the Year Award winners for 1990:

TRIBUTE TO AMANDA BLANFORD

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride and appreciation that I rise to commend a special young woman, Amanda Blanford—better known as Amy—of Louisville, KY, who recently completed her tenure as my page here in the House.

I am especially proud to announce that Amy received two Page School awards at the graduation ceremonies held on January 26. Amy received an Attendance Award and an Academic Certificate for maintaining a 93 percent or better grade average in all her subjects. Actually, this does not come as any surprise to me since Amanda is a straight-A student at Sacred Heart Academy, her high school in Louisville.

Back home in Louisville, Amy has exhibited all the necessary qualities to be a leader among her peers. She has maintained a high grade point average at Sacred Heart, a very demanding educational institution—despite participating in numerous extracurricular activities which include: Students Against Drunk Driving; Amnesty International; and the Young Leaders Institute. Amy also volunteers her time at a local hospital.

I am confident that the experience Amy gained as my Page here in Washington will prove invaluable for her, no matter what career path she may choose years from now. I hope Amy gives a career in public service some attention during her collegiate and post-collegiate years. She strikes me as one who possesses all the requisite talents, energies, and attributes to be an outstanding public official.

Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate Amy on job well done. I also commend her mother and father, Monica and Paul Blanford, for a great job of rearing. I salute Sacred Heart Academy for its role in forming Amy intellectually, spiritually, and socially.

It has been a pleasure to work with Amy, and I wish her every success in the future.

SERIOUS QUESTIONS REMAIN OVER PANAMA INVASION

HON. GERALD D. KLECZKA

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. KLECZKA. Mr. Speaker, the House considered House Concurrent Resolution 262, a concurrent resolution which addressed several aspects of the United States invasion of Panama.

First, the measure expressed Congress' sadness over the death of 23 American troops in the invasion and conveyed our condolences to their families. I fully support this sentiment as the loss of every American life in combat is tragic. I grieve for the spouses, children, parents, and siblings who will never see their loved ones again.

Second, the resolution commends the President for his efforts to provide for an early return of the remaining American troops who participated in the invasion. Such a prompt return is surely in the best interests of these troops, of Panama, and of our broader foreign policy toward Latin America.

Third, House Concurrent Resolution 262 urges the President to continue his efforts to promote democracy in Panama. While I also agree with this provision, the onus for creating and promoting democracy in Panama should lie with the Panamanians, most notably President Guillermo Endara, First Vice President Ricardo Arias Calderon, and Second Vice President Gillermo Ford.

Though I agree with all these provisions, the opening finding of this resolution deeply troubles me. It states that:

> Whereas the President, with the support of Congress and the American people, acted decisively and appropriately in ordering United States forces to intervene in Panama * * *

Part of this statement is just not accurate. President Bush may now have the support of Congress for the Panama invasion, but he could not possibly have had it before the action because Congress was never consulted. The House speaker, the Senate majority leader, and other congressional leaders were informed of the intervention only after it had been ordered.

Furthermore, I seriously question whether this action was appropriate. While our soldiers fought bravely and fully deserve to be commended, I believe the United States did violate the United Nations and OAS Charters by invading and overthrowing the government of a sovereign nation. Safeguarding American lives is justified under self-defense articles of both charters, but overthrowing a foreign government is prohibited as armed interference in other nations' internal affairs. This is an unfortunate precedent in a world which is increasingly turning to negotiations and peace over hostility and war.

The very real threat to American lives in Panama could have been met by the roughly 13,000 United States troops already stationed there; 11,000 more troops were not needed for this purpose. While creating democracy in Panama is laudable, again it is the responsibility of Panamanians, not Americans. Throughout Eastern Europe, citizens are overthrowing their oppressive governments without United States military intervention. Was this not possible in Panama?

In the end, enough serious questions remained in my mind over the President's decisionmaking process and the legality of the invasion for me to vote against House Concurrent Resolution 262.

TRIBUTE TO WILLIAM SUTTLE

HON. GEORGE (BUDDY) DARDEN

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Speaker, the Nation's oldest and largest military park, the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park in northwest Georgia, has lost an outstanding employee with the retirement of William Suttle. Mr. Suttle put in more than 35 years of service at the park, and as the park's maintenance division foreman, he has diligently and honorably carried out his responsibilities within the board mission of the National Park Service. Mr. Suttle has also contributed much to the community in which he lives through his work with young people and his involvement in his church. The National Park Service can take pride in the example William Suttle has provided, and I join with the many others in northwest Georgia who will miss seeing Mr. Suttle at the park but who wish him well in his retirement.

I ask that the following article from the January 10, 1990, Walker County Messenger be included in the RECORD.

[From the Walker County Messenger, Jan. 10, 1990]

SUTTLE RETIRES AFTER 35 YEARS OF SERVICE

LaFayette resident William P. Suttle was honored Jan. 6 by friends and co-workers with a retirement dinner.

He retired Jan. 1 after more than 35 years of service with Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park.

Suttle began his career with the National Park Service in 1952 as a seasonal maintenance employee.

During this time, he also held jobs with the Muller Company and Combustion Engineering in Chattanooga.

Prior to his employement with the National Park Service, he worked for LaFayette Cotton Mill, the Dupont Company in Chattanooga, and served in the U.S. Army for approximately two years.

In 1958, he was offered a permanent appointment with the National Military Park, progressing in a career which culminated this year with retirement from his position as the park's maintenance division foreman.

According to Suttle, one of the highlights of his career has been the chance to work with young people in several of the park's summer youth programs, and he takes great pride and pleasure in meeting them again today as adults.

His work offered him the opportunity to help them become successful, respected members of their communities.

Suttle can also take pride in a 39-year marriage to his wife, Earnestine White Suttle.

They have five children: a daughter in Summerville, another with the U.S. Army in Bonholder, Germany, two daughters and a son of LaFayette, and eight grandchildren.

Mrs. Suttle is active in her church and community, serves on the Minority Advisory Board at Dalton College, and is president of the Walker County Parent and Teachers' Association.

She has already made plans for her husband's newly realized "leisure" time" which includes continuing their church and community service, traveling and "just plain relaxing."

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, on January 12, 1990, the Hudson United Bank celebrated its 100th anniversary. Based in Union City, NJ, Hudson United Bank has been an integral part of the Hudson County community since its formation in 1890. It has helped the people of New Jersey grow and prosper, providing loans, high yield savings accounts, and financial advice to small businesses, investors, and families. Its continued growth is a tribute to its honest leadership, intelligent planning, and commitment to the community it serves.

It was on July 28, 1890, that the original predecessor of the Hudson United Bank was created with stock subscriptions exceeding $100,000. Meeks, vice president; James R. Ferens, secretary and treasurer.

The land for the bank's main office, now 3100 Bergenline Avenue, was purchased for $3,000. The building was erected on a lot 50 by 100 for a total cost of $20,000. It was designed by architect Oscar Golde.

As of January 6, 1891, the bank's assets had increased to $167,765.02. By December 31, 1892, the Hudson Trust & Savings Institution's assets had grown to $1,265,638.24.

Here is a summary of some important events in the history of the Hudson United Bank: 1890, incorporated as the Hudson Trust & Savings Institution; 1900, name changed to the Hudson Trust Co.; 1932, acquired the Hoboken Trust Co.; 1939, merged with the Columbia Trust Co.; 1946, acquired First National Bank of Union City; 1972, acquired United National Bank of Bergen County and changed name to Hudson United Bank; 1975, acquired Peoples Bank of Dunellen; and 1983, acquired Pan American Bank.

Present and former presidents of Hudson United Bank: 1989–present, Kenneth Neilson; 1977–89, John T. Clark; 1975–77, William J. Robertson; 1971–75, Frank T. Stella; 1962–71, Arthur Dickson; 1954–62, Otis W. Beaton; 1940–54, Clarence G. Meeks; 1929–40, James H.P. Reilly; 1921–29, John S. Mabon; 1899–21, Myles Tierney; and 1890–99, Samuel Bayard Dod.

Hudson United Bank has been and will continue to play an essential role in the growth and stability of Hudson County and northern New Jersey. I know my colleagues in the House of Representatives will join me in honoring the Hudson United Bank on the occasion of its 100th anniversary.

DR. RUSSELL B. SCOBIE, M.D., NEWBURGH'S CITIZEN OF THE YEAR

HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, each year the Newburgh Historical Association, of Newburgh, NY, recognizes a member of the community whose loyalty and commitment to the town of Newburgh is unquestionable. It is with great pleasure that I bring this year's recipient of this illustrious honor, Dr. Russell B. Scobie, M.D. to the attention of the American public.

Dr. Scobie has devoted 47 years of his life to ensuring that the tap water used in the Newburgh area, the Nation, and the world, is fluoridated. In 1943 he began the lobbying effort which was primarily responsible for Newburgh being selected for the now famous Newburgh-Kingston water fluoridation study which began on May 2, 1945. Since that time, he has traveled around the United States and the world, presenting papers and lectures on the advantages and benefits of fluoridated water.

Through Dr. Scobie's dedicated efforts there has been a noticeable decrease in the incidence of tooth decay throughout the world, including many Third World nations. The magnitude of Dr. Scobie's effect on global fluoridation may be best manifested by the world's appreciation. Some years ago D. Vladamir Rudko, Director of the World Health Organization [WHO], presented Dr. Scobie with an autographed copy of a WHO report on fluoridation which read "To Dr. Russell Scobie—you contributed the most to water fluoridation—we are trying to continue it."

Although Dr. Scobie's work with water fluoridation has been an important facet of his professional life, it has not been his sole community or medical endeavor. A graduate of Yale University, and the Yale School of Medicine, he has always been loyal to his alma mater. He has served as president of the Association of the Yale Alumni in Medicine, 1953–55; chairman of the Medical School Alumni Fund, 1959–63; and founder and first president of the Yale Club of the Mid-Hudson Valley. Additionally, Dr. Scobie has maintained a private practice in pediatric medicine since 1936. His other commitments include membership on the Newburgh Board of Education, the Newburgh Rotary Club, and serving as an elder at the Calvary Presbyterian Church in Newburgh.

In my opinion, the Newburgh Historical Association's decision to honor Dr. Scobie is a wonderful and appropriate choice. He is indeed a man who has devoted himself to improving the quality of life in the town of Newburgh and the world.

I encourage all of my colleagues to join me in paying tribute to Dr. Russell B. Scobie, his wife Katherine, and their twin children Robert and Barbara.

PROJECT 2000/LOVE: THE TENNIS CELEBRATION TO END WORLD HUNGER BY THE YEAR 2000

HON. TONY P. HALL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to your attention a campaign sponsored by the Hunger Project called 2000/LOVE. The event is being produced by the Tennis Professionals Foundation in support of the Hunger Project, whose goal is ending chronic, persistent hunger by the year 2000. The tennis celebration will take place on April 2 and 3 of this year at the Capital Centre in Washington, DC, and will include top-ranked tennis players such as Andre Agassi and Ivan Lendl, competing against Members of Congress.

The effort of eliminate chronic hunger and malnutrition worldwide is the work or organizations such as the Hunger Project, who labor endlessly to make hunger a global priority. I am pleased at the efforts of the staff and volunteers who are producing project 2000/LOVE. This campaign is urgent, and requires the joint efforts or our Government and our people toward finding solutions to improve the current situation. It is documented by experts that technical and financial resources exist to end hunger. Yet 750 million people continue to face hunger on a daily basis. Hunger contributes to environmental degradation, economic instability, and needless death. Project 2000/LOVE will raise funds to be used in the campaign to end hunger, a needed priority on the political and economic agenda of our Nation. Additionally, the tennis tournament will raise awareness of the persistence of chronic hunger.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that hunger and hunger-related disease are solvable problems. The success of programs such as Project 2000/LOVE rely on the assistance of people nationwide, and I would like to encourage my colleagues to join me in support of this worthy cause. I commend the Hunger Project for their continued efforts and I salute their contribution to the fight against hunger.

A TRIBUTE TO THE BARSTOW ELK'S DRUG AWARENESS PROGRAM

HON. JERRY LEWIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, the Government cannot go it alone in the war on drugs. To be successful, we need the help of citizens who will volunteer their time and skills to help our young people. I want to share with you today the outstanding work being done by the Elks, specifically the Elks of Barstow, CA, with their highly successful Drug Awareness Program.

The Elks realize that our kids today need to go beyond saying no to drugs. So they are sponsoring Scout Troops and sports teams and teen centers and dozens of other activities to supplement their Drug Awareness Program which educates young people about the dangers of drugs.

The Barstow Elks recently donated $1,000 to the local parks and recreation department to cover the costs of a youth basketball camp. The donation paid for T-shirts given to all the participants, a pizza party, refreshments, and gift certificates. More than 100 boys and girls benefited from this program which provided an alternative to the use of drugs and alcohol.

But the work of the Barstow Elks doesn't stop here, Mr. Speaker. Alfredo Gonzales, the president of the Barstow Elks Lodge gave out 200 drug education coloring books during a drug awareness presentation to young children at the Child Development Center at the Barstow Marine Corps Logistics Base. The lodge has also donated more than 2,000 of these coloring books to various organizations throughout the community.

The Barstow lodge has also donated $1,000 to assist the police department in the implementation of the DARE [Drug Abuse Resistance Education] program in the Barstow schools. This program will be taught to 400 sixth-grade students.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you to join me today in thanking the Elks and other volunteer groups for offering so generously their time and money in such worthwhile endeavors. Their commitment is making a critical difference to many young people and to our country.

REV. DR. JAMES M. LAWSON, CIVIL AND HUMAN RIGHTS ACTIVIST

HON. JULIAN C. DIXON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to congratulate Rev. Dr. James M. Lawson, Jr. who is receiving the Corita Kent Peace Award from the Immaculate Heart College Center. Reverend Lawson has contributed to the human family as a spiritual leader, civil rights activist, community achiever, and peacemaker.

The Corita Kent Peace Award, established by the Immaculate Heart College Center for peace, justice, and global cooperation, honors the memory of Corita Kent—an internationally known artist whose work is noted for the lively use of color, words, and text which proclaim that the most ordinary and mundane objects in our everyday world are symbols of the spiritual, the beauty, and the hope that permeate all life. The award is given to those who do not make a distinction between their personal and public lives as peacemakers and who, through their lives, words and actions express the dream of life without war. There is no one more deserving of the Corita Kent Award than Jim.

Born in Pennsylvania, Jim was a champion debater in high school, and in college where he received a bachelor's degree in sociology and psychology. He went on to graduate school at Boston, Oberlin, and Vanderbilt Universities to study theology. Throughout his life, Reverend Lawson has been committed and dedicated to human causes. While serving as national president of the United Methodist Youth Fellowship, he spent over a year in Federal prison as a conscientious objector. He went on to India where he worked as a campus minister and coach. As a friend and associate of Dr. Martin Luther King, Reverend Lawson trained freedom riders and became one of the preeminent voices for nonviolent direct action.

Today, Jim is channeling his energies on urban problems, especially poverty in Los Angeles. He serves as president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference [SCLC]/Greater Los Angeles, and is vice president of the SCLC national board. Jim is pastor of Holman United Methodist Church in my congressional district, and is the president of the Peace with Justice Leadership Conference, a coalition of 60 denominational and religious groups. He contributes to a variety of organizations including the Conference Council of Ministries, the Religious Leaders Network of the Interfaith Council to Reverse the Arms Race, the Advisory Council of Clergy and Laity Concerned, the National Advisory Council of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, and the Los Angeles County Mental Health Association.

I join his wife Dorothy, their sons—John, Morris, and Seth—his colleagues, and host of friends in congratulating Jim as he receives the Corita Kent Peace Award. I look forward to his continued contributions to the world community.

COMMERCIAL ACTIVITIES CONTRACTING PROCEDURES ACT OF 1990

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I am introducing today a bill that is the first fully comprehensive effort to place into law the Government's program for designating those commercial activities that will be contracted out and those that will be performed by Government employees.

It is important that we try to place some parameters around the immensity of the effort we are addressing with this piece of proposed legislation. According to OMB, the Federal Government spends approximately $20 billion annually for civil service employees to provide commercial services. In June 1987, the Congressional Budget Office estimated that there are about 1.4 million Federal workers engaged in providing these types of services to the Government. Not only would this bill impact these employees, but it also covers the approximately 800,000 employees of the U.S. Postal Service and the yet uncalculated billions involved with those postal jobs.

OMB has recently testified that presently completed inventories of activities scheduled to be reviewed for possible contracting out involve over 300,000 Federal jobs.

As first stated in 1955, it was the policy of the Federal Government to rely on the private sector for the provision of all commercial services. That policy was restated in 1966 in OMB circular A–76 but was since modified in 1979 and 1983. These newer policies do not contain the strict prohibitions first announced in the 1950's but, rather, make contracting out dependent upon competitions between Federal employees and private sector firms.

OMB reports that since 1981, 87,000 Federal jobs have been reviewed for possible conversion to contract performance. The in-house estimates, or "bids," of performance by Government employees have "beat" the contract bids in head-to-head competitions in about 50 percent of the cases. From these competitions, we are told, the Government has saved a total of $843 million for an average cost savings of 27 percent over original operating costs. These savings are alleged to result both from contract conversions and from reorganizations of Federal employees resulting from cost comparison analyses.

My bill would not change the underlying philosophy of Government; namely, that most commercial activities should be contracted for with commercial sources when they can be performed by those activities more economically. However, my bill would set out the ground rules for that competition so that Government employees would be competing on an equal basis with the private sector. My bill would also infuse a much needed dose of due process into the system. Provisions are contained in the bill that would give appeal rights to all interested parties to protest, before independent boards and administrative law judges, performance work statements and cost comparison analyses. The bill also sets into place a method to calculate the savings of the program and to verify those savings in subsequent years.

Perhaps the most unique provision of this bill calls for the continued competition between Government employees and private sector contractors for the performance of commercial activities. The present A–76 circular is totally one sided—only activities being performed by Government employees are included on a list or inventory of commercial activities to determine if they should be converted to contract. That decision is made after a price competition and, if the private sector low bidder beats the in-house cost estimate or bid by more than 10 percent, the activity is converted to contract. My bill would not alter that basic concept—but it would also require the maintenance of another inventory list of commercial activities being performed by private sector firms. These activities would have to be periodically competed with the Government's in-house cost estimates. Only if private sector firms could continue to provide activities more economically, would those activities remain available for performance under contract. If Government employees could do the same work at lower costs, the activity would be moved back for in-house performance. It is through this system of checks and balances that we can assure that the taxpayer gets the most for his or her dollar.

The major provisions of my bill follow:

First. The act would present a comprehensive and efficient method for determining what commercial activities should be performed by Government employees and which activities should be contracted out with commercial business concerns. Detailed provisions are also included dealing with the reporting of commercial activities and how savings are to be measured.

Second. The act would cover all executive branch agencies and departments, as well as the U.S. Postal Service.

Third. The act would require that all governmental functions be performed by Government employees and that other commercial activities be performed by private sector firms unless:

No commercial source is capable of performing the work;

Use of a contractor would cause unacceptable delay;

The commercial activity involves patient care at a Government-operated hospital and it is in the best interest of the patients to keep performance by Government employees; or

Based on a cost comparison study Government employee can, with respect to commercial activities presently being performed by contract, perform the work at a lower cost; and, with respect to activities presently being performed by Government employees, perform the work at no more than 10 percent higher than the anticipated cost of contracting out.

Fourth. As a general rule, work that could be more economically performed by Government employees would be converted to in-house performance.

Fifth. The act contains detailed provisions on how to formulate performance work statements and conduct cost analyses.

Sixth. Appeal rights are given to interested parties to protest, before independent boards and administrative law judges, performance work statements, and cost comparison analyses.

Seventh. All agencies must prepare and make publicly available inventories of commercial activities containing detailed information on the nature and performance of those activities.

Eighth. Displaced Government employees are provided rights dealing with reemployment by the Government and employment with the successful contractor when a commercial activity is converted to contract.

Ninth. Detailed reporting requirements are imposed so that the true cost benefits of converting to contract and converting to in-house performance can be accurately measured.

Tenth. The act would take effect 180 days after the date of enactment.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank the American Federation of Government Employees and its national president, John N. Sturdivant, for their invaluable assistance in formulating this important piece of legislation.

I look forward to working with the administration, organized labor, and the business community in a bipartisan fashion to bring this legislation before the President for his signature. I urge my colleagues to cosponsor and actively support this most important measure.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF THE COMMERCIAL ACTIVITIES CONTRACTING PROCEDURES ACT OF 1990 (H.R. 4015)

Section 1. Short Title. Provides that this Act may be cited as the "Commercial Activities Procedures Act of 1990."

Section 2. Purposes. This section specifies four purposes for the Act: (1) to establish uniform standards for determining the most economical and efficient method to acquire commercial services; (2) to provide for accountability and equitable standards; (3) to ensure fair competitions and an opportunity for interested parties to participate fairly in the process; and (4) to provide for annual reports regarding commercial activities and to substantiate estimated and actual savings.

Section 3. Definitions. This section contains a series of definitions as follows: (1) "Administrator" means the Administrator of the Office of Federal Procurement Policy (OFPP); (2) "adversely affected employee" means any civilian employee of an agency who, as a result of a decision to convert to contract, will either be released from service or reduced in competitive grade or employment; (3) "agency" means a Federal agency or department as defined under 41 U.S.C. 403 and includes the United States Postal Service; (4) "commercial activity" means a product or service which may be procured from a commercial source and which is identical or substantially similar to the form in which that product or service is sold to the general public; (5) "commercial source" is a business or other non-government entity located within the United States and which is capable of performing a commercial activity; (6) "conversion to contract" means the changeover of performance by government employees to performance by a commercial source; (7) "conversion to in-house performance" means the changeover of performance by a commercial source to performance by government employees; (8) "full time equivalent work year" means 2,087 paid labor hours in a fiscal year or such other period of time as may be established by law; (9) "Government" means the Federal Government; (10) "Government employee" means an employee of an agency; and (11) "governmental function" means any activity intimately related to the public interest and that requires either the exercise of discretion or the making of policy decisions for the Government.

Section 4. Application. This Act would not apply to three types of situations: (1) in any case when its application would be contrary to an international agreement; (2) to DoD in times of declared war, military mobilization, or other emergency declared by the President; and (3) to research and develop activities.

This Act is also subject to a series of limitations. It does not (1) provide authority to enter into contracts; (2) establish any rights for employees of commercial sources; (3) authorize conversion to contract of any commercial activity in order to avoid personnel or salary ceilings; or (4) authorize the conversion to contract of any governmental function.

Section 5. Inventories of Commercial Activities. Subject to the provision of section 4 (dealing with the application and limitations of the program) and paragraph 3 of this subsection (a) (dealing with commercial activities utilizing less than 10 full-time equivalent work years and governmental functions), not later than March 31 of each year every agency must prepare and make public an inventory of all commercial activities it anticipates will be performed by government employees during the following year. Each activity included on the inventory must reference: (1) the number of work years involved; (2) the commercial activity and the place of performance; (3) the date the commercial activity was last reviewed for conversion to contract; (4) the date of the next planned review (including the anticipated completion date); and (5) the reason for performance of the commercial activity by government employees. Commercial activities requiring less than ten (10) full-time equivalent work years and governmental functions may be excluded from the inventory.

Not later than March 31 of each year, every agency must prepare and make publicly available an inventory of commercial activities that are or will be performed by a commercial source during that year under a contract with the agency. For each item included on the inventory there must be a discription of (1) the activity and the place of performance; (2) the name of the person who most recently performed the activity; (3) the date the activity was last subject to a cost comparison analysis; (4) the date of the next planned review of the activity for possible conversion to in-house performance; (5) the contract number for that commercial activity; (6) the contract price; (7) for each activity converted to contract during the preceding 5-year period, the last annual payment for that activity; (8) the total cost incurred by the government for conducting that procurement; and (9) the reason for performance of the commercial activity by a commercial source.

An agency shall not include a commercial activity in its inventory of contracted out activities if that activity: (1) was converted to contract within the last two year period; (2) performance of the commercial activity by commercial sources requires less than 10 full-time equivalent work years annually; (3) the commercial activity will be performed pursuant to section 8(a) of the Small Business Act, section 1207 of P.L. 99-661 (both dealing with small disadvantaged businesses); or by a sheltered workshop for the blind or severely handicapped; or is a governmental function.

Not later than 60 days after an inventory is made publicly available by an agency, a labor organization representing employees of that agency may petition the head of the agency to include or exclude a commercial activity from an inventory.

Section 6. Performance of Activities Under Contract. Performance of commercial activities contained on an inventory shall be performed by one or more commercial sources unless the head of the agency determines that: (1) no commercial source is capable of performing the contract; (2) use of a commercial source would cause unacceptable delay or disruption to a program or activity of the agency; (3) the commercial activity involves patient care at a hospital operated by the government and performance of the activity by government employees would be in the best interest of patient care; (4) the commercial activity is a governmental function; or (5) based upon a cost comparison study conducted under section 7, government employees are performing, or can reasonably be expected to perform the commercial activity at an estimated cost that is (a) in the case of a commercial activity being performed by a commercial source, less than the total costs incurred by the government under contract; or (b) in the case of a commercial activity that is presently being performed by government employees, not more than 10 percent higher than the estimated total costs of contracting for the provision of that commercial activity.

Section 7. Cost Comparison Analysis. Before converting to contract or converting to in-house performance, an agency must conduct a cost comparison analysis under this section. For the purposes of such analyses, all costs will be computed on the basis of a final performance work statement prepared pursuant to section 8. Notwithstanding this general rule, a commercial activity may be converted to contract without conducting a cost comparison analysis if the contract is to be awarded pursuant to: (1) section 8(a) of the Small Business Act; (2) section 1207 of P.L. 99-661; or (3) the Javits-Wagner-O'Day Act.

Within 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Federal Acquisition Regulatory Council shall amend the Federal Acquisition Regulation to establish requirements for conducting cost comparison analyses. The regulation must provide that (a) the cost of performance by government employees shall be determined based on the most efficient and cost effective organization practicable; (b) the cost of performance by a commercial source shall be based on full and open competition; (c) the pricing method for evaluating all offers from commercial sources shall be firm fixed price unless the head of the agency, on a nondelegable basis, determines that a cost reimbursable contract is appropriate; and (d) the term of a contract for commercial activities shall not exceed 3 years, including all options.

Regulations promulgated under this section must also include provisions dealing with the calculation of all relevant costs of performance of a commercial activity. These costs are to include: personnel costs (including pay, retirement, and fringe benefits); material, equipment, and supply costs; utility costs (including those utilities provided by the government); maintenance cost of government owned machinery, tools, equipment, and other items; depreciation; rent; maintenance, repair and upkeep; insurance; travel; overhead; and such other additional costs as may be appropriate.

Costs that would be the same for performance by a commercial activity and for performance by government employees may be excluded from the analysis, if documented and made part of the record.

In addition to the costs determined above, the fair market value of all government property to be used by either a commercial source or government employees must be taken into account when performing a cost analysis.

Once a cost comparison is completed by an agency, it is to be submitted to that agency's review board established under section 9.

The review board shall review the adequacy of each cost comparison analysis submitted to it (including the performance work statement on which the analysis is based) with respect to currency, reasonableness, accuracy, and completeness.

The review board must announce no less frequently than monthly its final determination of all cost comparison analyses submitted to the board within the preceding month.

An interested party may appeal a decision of a review board to the head of the agency not later than 30 days after the review board announces its fnal decision. That party is entitled to a hearing on the record in accordance with chapter 5 of title 5, United States Code. The head of the agency shall sustain the decision of the board unless it is found not to be substantially justified by the facts, or contrary to law or regulation.

For purposes of this provision the term "interested party" means any: (1) adversely affected employee; (2) labor organization accorded exclusive recognition to represent adversely affected employees; (3) former Federal employee who has a reasonable prospect for re-employment by the government if a commercial activity were to be converted to in-house performance; and (4) prospective offeror whose direct economic interest would be adversely affected by a decision not to convert to contract or to convert a contract to in-house performance.

An agency cannot take any action to convert to contract or to convert to in-house performance a commercial activity during the 30-day period following a decision of the review board or during any period in which an appeal to a review board decision is pending.

The head of an agency must provide to all agency employees performing a commercial activity timely notification of each cost comparison analysis that is initiated with respect to that activity and shall keep those employees duly informed of the progress of each such analysis.

No person may disclose a cost comparison analysis before the agency issues a public notice that the commerical activity will either be converted to contract, converted to in-house performance, or will be performed by government employees. Nothing contained in this provision authorizes the disclosure of proprietary information that would adversely affect the financial or competitive position of a commercial source if released to the public. In addition, this provision does not limit the authority of Congress or any law enforcement authority to obtain information otherwise available under law.

Section 8.

Performance Work Statements. The head of an agency must prepare a performance work statement for each commercial activity for which a cost comparison analysis is conducted under section 7. Each performance work statement must define the scope of work of a commercial activity by: (1) delineating standards of performance, critical elements and time restraints; (2) using a description of work that does not exceed the minimum requirements of that agency; (3) describing the technical qualifications and skills of needed personnel; and (4) designating the types of machinery, equipment, tools, and other items needed for acceptably performing the commercial activity.

Commercial activities may be combined for the purpose of preparing performance work statements only if such commercial activities are logically related to each other so that the successful performance of one activity is dependent on the successful performance of the other and are combined in a manner that promotes full and open competition at the prime contract level among the greatest practicable number of commercial sources.

Before a performance work statement is submitted to a review board, the head of an agency shall provide to all potential adversely affected employees (and their collective bargaining representatives) a period of at least 60 days in which to submit comments and recommendations.

Such comments or recommendations must be in writing and shall be responded to individually and in writing indicating whether the recommendation will be incorporated within the performance work statement.

An employee whose recommendation is denied has 30 days to appeal the negative determination to the appropriate review board. If the decision of the agency is not substantially justified or is contrary to law or regulation, the board must sustain the appeal and require the agency to make appropriate changes in the performance work statement. A performance work statement shall not be final until all employee appeals with respect to that performance work statement are resolved.

Not later than 15 days after completing a performance work statement, the agency must: (1) publish in the Commerce Business Daily the fact that the Performance Work Statement is available; (2) provide a copy of the performance work statement to each labor organization representing government employees who perform any commercial activity that is the subject of the performance work statement; and (3) provide written notice to all government employees providing a commercial activity that is the subject of a performance work statement advising them of the availability of a copy of the performance work statement upon request. Performance work statements provided to collective bargaining representatives shall be provided not later than 30 days after final approval of the statement. All other parties are to receive the performance work statement within 30 days after the agency receives a request for the statement. With the exception of performance work statements provided to labor organizations, an agency may charge a nominal fee for reproducing and mailing performance work statements to requesting parties.

Section 9. Review Boards. Each agency is to establish a review board for the acquisition of commercial activities. Each board is to be chaired by the official of the agency assigned by statute with the responsibility for acquisition strategy, or if no such individual in that agency is assigned by statute, by the official designated pursuant to section 16(3) of the Office of Federal Procurement Policy Act.

An agency review board is to consist of the Chairperson and such other government employees as the Chairperson believes appropriate. However, a person may not serve on a review board during its consideration of a matter pertaining to an organizational unit of the agency that employs that person.

Review boards shall review cost comparison analysis prepared by agencies under section 7 and consider employee appeals under section 8(c) dealing with performance work statements.

Section 10. Re-employment of Displaced Employees. Agencies must, with respect to adversely affected employees, (1) exert maximum effort to fill available positions with such employees; (2) establish a re-employment priority list and a positive placement program; and (3) pay reasonable costs for training and relocating the employee if that leads to placement of the employee within the agency.

The Office of Personnel Management must, with respect to adversely affected employees: (1) insure that such employees have access to government-wide placement programs on a priority of Labor regarding job opportunities in the private sector.

A commercial source who wins a contract pursuant to a cost comparison analysis must, prior to entering into the contract: (1) advise adversely affected employees that they have a right of first refusal for available positions for which they are qualified; and (2) actively assist and facilitate the hiring of such employees. These duties of the commercial source are to be incorporated into the contract by the government.

Section 11. Reporting. The OFPP Administrator is to issue regulations which require the head of each agency to report annually to OFPP on the number and dollar value of commercial activities that are converted to contract or converted to in-house performance. In addition, each agency is to report the dollar savings anticipated from such actions. By January 31 of each year the OFPP Administrator is to prepare and submit a report to the Congress describing: (1) the savings from conversions to contract and conversions to in-house performance; (2) the number of Federal employees performing commercial activities; (3) the estimated number of private sector employees performing commercial activities for the government; and (4) the contract number and value for each commercial activity procured by an agency under contract in the preceding year, specifying the name of the contractor and its location. The Comptroller General may provide the OFPP Administrator such assistance as the Administrator considers necessary to establish criteria or measures pertaining to cost savings. The head of each agency must provide the OFPP Administrator upon request with such resources and assistance as the Administrator considers necessary for preparing reports required by this section.

Section 12. Procurement Protests. This section would amend 31 U.S.C. section 3551(2) by providing that GAO bid protest procedures are not applicable to conversions to contract or conversions to in-house performance.

Section 13. Effective Date. This Act would take effect 180 days after the date of enactment.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH—A TIME FOR REFLECTION

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, as you know, Black History Month was established to set-aside a special period of time so that our Nation could recognize and celebrate the heritage, achievements and contributions of black Americans to our country. Each year, during the month of February, schools, colleges, universities, religious and social organizations, and communities throughout the United States plan and participate in various activities designed to provide Americans with an opportunity to recognize and appreciate the important role blacks have played in the development of our great Nation.

Black History Month has also served to remind us of the work that still must be done to ensure that all Americans can fully enjoy the blessings of liberty enshrined in and guaranteed by the Constitution. Mr. Speaker, I can recite the names of people like Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Rosa Parks, Thurgood Marshall, Harriet Beecher Stowe and thousands of other famous and not so famous Americans who fought against the shameful injustice of racism, bigotry, and discrimination. Their names, however, are meaningless unless we work to understand the goal they were working towards and join them in championing the cause of equality.

When our democratic principles are not applied equally, the Nation's moral health is in jeopardy. As Dr. King declared, "Injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere." Black Americans have made great strides in securing the rights of freedom, justice and equality in the United States, but unfortunately the Nation's work is far from complete.

An integral part of our endeavors to further equality rests partially in the development of a school system that provides the black community with opportunities for advancement through education. Horace Mann Bond, the first black president of Pennsylvania's Lincoln University, correctly noted that education is "the most important factor in elevating the life of a people." He believed that education was an essential and formidable weapon in the fight against racism and that education would "accelerate social change."

At present, our educational programs are failing to reach all segments of our society. High school dropout rates among black youths have risen and the undereducation of black youths continues. These youth, and consequentially the Nation, are at risk, and this crisis in education only serves to undermine the democratic processes in our country. I do not claim to hold the answers to these problems. However, acknowledging that a problem exists is, as we know, the first step toward finding solutions.

Black History Month presents an opportunity for us, as a nation, to reflect on the contributions of black Americans, to recognize that there is still much work to be done, and to rededicate ourselves to promoting the American creed that all men are created equal. Mr. Speaker, this challenge confronts all Americans. So, let us use this time as an opportunity to celebrate black history and to reassert the cause of freedom, justice, and equality for all.

REUNIFICATION OF CYPRUS

HON. FRANK PALLONE, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. PALLONE. Mr. Speaker, today I join with so many of my colleagues to remind the world of the tragedy of the divided island nation of Cyprus. We are fortunate to be living in a time of great change throughout the world, a time when so many walls and barriers to freedom are tumbling down. During this time, let us not forget the people of Cyprus who have been suffering since the Turkish invasion of 1974.

We were all encouraged by the leadership shown by U.N. Secretary General Javier Perez de Cuellar in initiating talks between President Vassiliou and Rauf Danktash, the Turkish Cypriot leader. However, our hopes that Cyprus would soon be reunified have been diminished by the intransigence of Danktash and the subsequent breakdown of the sponsored talks.

The Cyprus issue is not simply a parochial dispute between Greece and Turkey; it involves the rule of law and the fundamental principles of democratic government. There are presently 35,000 Turkish troops and 60,000 Turkish colonists in Northern Cyprus; 200,000 Greek Cypriots remain refugees in their own land.

Mr. Speaker, a barbed wire barricade commonly referred to as the "Green Line" presently physically divides the island nation of Cyprus. Let us hope that we shall soon see the dismantling of the "Green Line" and the reunification of Cyprus.

COMMEMORATING BOB AND SANDY MILLER, BISHOP GORMAN HIGH SCHOOL'S "KNIGHT OF THE GAEL" HONOREES

HON. JAMES H. BILBRAY

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. BILBRAY. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to honor two of Nevada's most respected and admired leaders, Gov. Bob Miller and First Lady Sandy Miller. On Wednesday, March 7, 1990, Bishop Gorman High School will dedicate its eighth annual "Knight of the Gael" to the Governor and first lady. The Millers will be recognized for their contributions not only to Bishop Gorman High School, but also to the Las Vegas community and the State of Nevada. They are both truly deserving of this honor.

Governor Miller has been a preeminent State leader, dedicated to serving the citizens of Nevada for many years. The Chicago born Governor began calling Nevada home at an early age. He attended Bishop Gorman High School and upon graduation in 1963, commenced studies at the University of Santa Clara. Graduating with a B.A. in political science in 1967, he went on to receive his juris doctor degree from Loyola Law School in Los Angeles in 1971, all the while acting as part-time deputy sheriff in Las Vegas and Los Angeles.

Bob returned to Nevada to practice law and was employed as a deputy District Attorney for Clark County. In 1973, he became the first legal adviser to the Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Department. During 1975–78, Bob was the Las Vegas Township Justice of the Peace, and in 1979 he was elected Clark County District Attorney. Reelected in 1982, he became the first Clark County District Attorney in modern history to win reelection. Also that year, Bob was chosen by President Reagan to serve on the nine-member President's Task Force on Victims of Crime. In 1987, he went on to become the Lieutenant Governor of the State of Nevada, and in 1989, following Governor Bryan's election to the U.S. Senate, Bob Miller became Nevada's Acting Governor.

Sandy, born in Denver, CO, has been a resident of Nevada since 1951 and an active community and civic leader. Attending both the University of Nevada, Reno and Las Vegas, she received a B.S. in education from UNLV in 1971. Later that year she attended the Lexington School for the Deaf in New York, and returned to teach the aurally handicapped at the Ruby Thomas Elementary School in Las Vegas for 4 years. A committed advocate for children with learning disabilities and representative for teachers in politics, she prepared and lobbied legislative proposals and worked on the design committee for the deaf education wing at Ruby Thomas.

Her energy and commitment to helping and educating people is shown in her dedication to civic work. She is on the advisory board of the University of Nevada, Young Volunteers of Nevada, the Children's Museum of Carson City, the Nevada Museum of Art and New Horizons, a learning disability group. Her support has reached numerous charities including work with a literacy and "Say No To Drugs" Program, the Children's Inn of Greater Las Vegas, Nevada Women's Fund, Junior League, PTA,, the American Cancer Society's special projects, and March of Dimes.

Mr. Speaker, by any standard—be it professional contributions, civic leadership or community service—Bob and Sandy Miller represent the finest in Nevada's commitment to excellence. They have established themselves as outstanding leaders, giving much of their time and energy to the people of our State. I urge my colleagues to join me today in commending the Governor and first lady in their well-deserved recognition for their contributions and loyalty to Bishop Gorman and to Nevada.

NATIONAL VISITING NURSES ASSOCIATION WEEK

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor the Visiting Nurses Association of western Massachusetts. During the week of February 18–24, our country will be celebrating National Visiting Nurses Association Week in recognition of the VNA's outstanding and necessary service to our communities.

One of our oldest and most enduring health institutions in America, the VNA's have been providing quality home care for our elderly, our infants and new mothers, and medical-surgical patients of all ages who have needed their special services. In my district, the Visiting Nurse Associations of Holyoke, Pittsfield, Greenfield, Pioneer Valley, Easthampton, Northampton and others have all been instrumental in bringing compassionate, quality home care to the people of western Massachusetts. They have all brought dignity to the medical and social needs of the terminally ill.

The complexity of new medical technology is a major challenge facing home care nurses today. These dedicated and committed professionals deserve our special recognition and support as they keep pace with the rapidly changing demands of the population.

I especially want to commend the oldest VNA in my district, the Holyoke Visiting Nurse Association, which has been serving my district for 85 years. The Holyoke VNA has been a leader in establishing a new hospice life care program for the terminally ill. By working with a committed team of health care professionals and volunteers, the Holyoke VNA Hospice Program is pioneering new approaches to caring for the sick and dying. Community support for the hospice has been heartening: both the St. Peter's Lutheran Church and the Second Congregational Church of Holyoke have been generous in their support of the hospice program.

MEDICARE PART A BUDGET CUTS

HON. JAMES T. WALSH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my extreme disappointment with the recently proposed budget cuts for Medicare part A. A $3.5 billion cut will have a devastating impact on the hospitals in the State of New York.

In New York, our average hospital bed occupancy rate is 90 to 95 percent compared to a national average of 60 percent. With a Medicare population at 50 to 60 percent of total occupancy, much of the hospital's funds come from the Medicare Program. The advent of the diagnostic related groups [DRG's] means patients are entering hospitals sicker than before. Our aging population is an additional stress on an already lean reimbursement program.

Our hospitals can only take so much in cutbacks before the quality of care is severely compromised. As it stands now, emergency ambulance patients are being refused entrance by nearby emergency rooms because of a lack of beds and staff. We all know that cardiac cases cannot afford the time taken in transporting to a distant facility.

The 60 rural hospitals in New York State are in even further dire straits as their level of reimbursement from Medicare lags far behind that of their urban counterparts. Legislation has been passed to remedy this problem by 1995, but I fear that many of these facilities will not survive that long.

I remind my colleagues that the urgency of this situation may someday affect us. Should one of us be unfortunate enough to require immediate ambulance service to the closest hospital and it is full, we may be the ones sent 50 miles out of town because of inadequate funding.

New York is nearly at the crisis level. Please join me in working to restore some of these life threatening budget cuts.

TRIBUTE TO HIS BEATITUDE MAR RAPHAEL I. BIDAWID, CHALDEAN PATRIARCH OF BABYLON

HON. SANDER M. LEVIN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to extend a heartfelt welcome to His Beatitude Mar Raphael I. Bidawid, Chaldean Patriarch of Babylon, on the occasion of his first formal pastoral visit to the United States this week.

The Chaldeans, who today form the largest Christian community in Iraq, are one of the six major Eastern rites of the Catholic Church. In the 17th District of Michigan, they are a thriving people I am proud to have the opportunity to represent.

The contributions of the Detroit-area Chaldeans, numbering roughly 60,000, are significant; they are civic activists laboring for the good of their own and the larger community, they are entrepreneurs who display a relentless work ethic, and they are dedicated professionals.

Clearly, they have woven themselves into the fabric of American life and, indeed, they are proud Americans. But they hold equally proudly and firmly to their traditions. They are unwavering in their devotion to their church, which is the center of their social and cultural as well as their religious life. Perhaps most distinct of all is their deep commitment to family life and family values.

The visit by His Beatitude Mar Raphael I. Bidawid is of major importance. This learned, esteemed and imposing man, elected to this post only last May, is the spiritual head of this proud and devout people. His visit tells the Chaldeans living here that despite the geographical distance between them and their land of origin, they are still inextricably linked to their roots, to their traditions, to their beloved heritage.

I am honored to welcome him.

RECOGNIZING MR. RAYMOND EARL WILLIAMS

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to recognize Mr. Raymond Earl Williams, former corporate vice president, labor relations, on his retirement from AT&T. Mr. Williams worked for AT&T for 38 years.

Mr. Williams, 63 years of age, was very innovative as a labor relations executive. He was a proponent of the constructive union/management relationship as well as an advocate of the national bargaining concept. One of Mr. Williams' higher achievements was his instrumental negotiating of the first ever family care plan on a national scope. With this and the help from AT&T, he was able to create a

$5 million family care fund, which is now known as the Williams Fund.

Most recently, Mr. Raymond Williams won the 1989 National Womens Political Caucus Award and had the distinction of being appointed by Ronald Reagan and serving on the President's Advisory Committee on Mediation and Conciliation.

Mr. Williams presently resides in Madison, NJ, with his wife, Mary, of 35 years. He has three children and four grandchildren.

On this occasion of his retirement, I extend my congratulations to Raymond and wish him continued success and best wishes for the future.

SALUTE TO DOROTHY P. (DOTTIE) MARKS

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I want to share with you the outstanding career of Dorothy P. "Dottie" Marks, who retired on December 29, 1989, after 25 years of dedication and hard work for the city of Antioch, CA.

Dottie began her career with the city of Antioch as deputy city clerk in 1964. In 1972, she put these skills to use in her elected position as city clerk. In appreciation of the quality of her work, the residents of Antioch reelected her city clerk five times; each time she received the greatest number of votes in the city's history. Dottie is also a certified municipal clerk and an active member of the International Institute of Municipal Clerks and City Clerks Association of California.

In addition to her responsibilities to Antioch and its residents, Dottie balances her time with various community organizations. She has belonged to groups such as the Young Ladies Institute, the Soroptimists International of Antioch, Delta Christian Foundation, Bocce Ball Federation, California State Elected Officials, Delta Learning Center Board of Directors, Antioch Historical Society, Antioch/Chichibu Sister City, and the Delta Memorial Hospital Auxiliary.

Although her career required much of her valuable time, Dottie was still able to find enjoyment in her many hobbies and with her two children, Cheryl and Gregory, and her husband Joe.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleagues in the House of Representatives join with me in congratulating Dottie Marks for her outstanding career with the city of Antioch and to wish her the very best in her retirement.

TRIBUTE TO THE CHAN YIN CHONG FONG ASSOCIATION

HON. NANCY PELOSI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to share with my colleagues the 50th anniversary of the Chan Yin Chong Fong Association in San Francisco on February 18, 1990.

The association was founded by the forefathers of the Chan Yin Chong Fong family on April 25, 1940. During the 18th century, new immigrants to the San Francisco Bay area utilized the association as a place to renew old friendships and to meet acquaintances. Such informal gatherings continue to prompt exchanges of information and serve as a vital communication link for family members.

The membership of the Chan Yin Chong Fong Association includes new immigrants, and first, second, third, and fourth generation Chinese. Their professions include public school principals, union labors, farmers, trade merchants, homemakers, and students. The 400 registered members do not pay dues and all contributions are voluntary.

The main activities of the association are the annual banquet reunion during the Chinese New Year celebration in February and other social activities within the Chinese community.

The Chan Yin Chong Fong Association continues to stress the importance of familial ties and the maintenance of a strong Chinese culture in the Land of the Gold Mountain. I commend their loyalty to their homeland and to their new home in the San Francisco Bay area.

ENCOURAGING NEGOTIATION BETWEEN THE CANADIAN PACIFIC AND CONRAIL

HON. SHERWOOD L. BOEHLERT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 20, 1990

Mr. BOEHLERT. Mr. Speaker, like many of my colleagues in the Northeast, I have been following the developments surrounding the sale of the Delaware & Hudson Railroad with great interest. The trustee in bankruptcy has accepted a bid from the Canadian Pacific Railroad, which is currently funding operations on the Delaware & Hudson. Canadian Pacific's bid, however, is contingent upon obtaining trackage rights from Conrail to Hagerstown, MD.

While it would be inappropriate for me to become involved in the selection of the ultimate purchaser of the Delaware & Hudson, it is quite appropriate that I point out the stake which New York State has in seeing that the Delaware & Hudson is acquired and operated by a responsible purchaser. Continued operation of the Delaware & Hudson means a continuation of the services and jobs and revenues that the Delaware & Hudson provides and are so important to our communities.

Canadian Pacific is obviously a viable candidate and one which I would like to see remain in the bidding process. That's why I would like to encourage Conrail to enter into meaningful discussions with Canadian Pacific in order to avoid the loss of this healthy contender for the Delaware & Hudson.

I am not asking that Conrail make concessions which would harm the railroad. On the other hand, I would like to think that discussions with Canadian Pacific might lead to a solution which would benefit all, perhaps most importantly to me, the people of New York, who have always counted on the Delaware & Hudson Railroad to be there when they need it.

We pray that the laws passed in the U.S. House of Representatives will always mirror and reflect Your eternal justice, Your eternal love, and Your eternal peace. We ask that You give our Representatives the grace, the wisdom, and the fortitude to act in accordance with the light and warmth of Your divine law as expressed in their consciences.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Lundregan, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

H.R. 150. An act to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to provide a procedure for an alien who dies while serving on active-duty with the United States Armed Forces during certain periods of hostilities to be considered a citizen of the United States at the time of the alien's death; and

H.R. 2281. An act to amend the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 to extend the authorization for certain school dropout demonstration programs.

REV. JAMES LYONS, PASTOR, ST. PETER'S ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, VOLO, IL

(Mr. CRANE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, Father James Lyons is the pastor of St. Peter's Roman Catholic Church in Volo—in the 12th Congressional District of Illinois. He has been pastor at St. Peter's for the past 6 years.

In addition to his duties there, he teaches theology at St. Mary's of the Lake Seminary in Mundelein, IL. He was ordained in 1951 at Mundelein.

His theology courses center around the works of St. Thomas Aquinas and Cardinal John H. Newman.

A native Chicagoan, Father Lyons served as chaplain of St. George's and Palos Community Hospitals. He was an associate pastor at the parishes of Sacred Heart in Hubbard Woods, St. Gertrude's on Chicago's north side, and the Nativity of Our Lord on the city's south side.

Father Lyons is very active in the prolife movement.

He has been a participant and leader in the Great Books Program, dealing with adult education.

He is very concerned about the need for strong international laws and an international community to prevent wars.

It has certainly been a privilege to have Father Lyons give the opening prayer at today's session of the House of Representatives. And I know that Congressman HENRY HYDE, a good friend of Father Lyons, too, wishes him the very best in his religious endeavors.

I might add one other point, Mr. Speaker, Volo, IL, is a very small community, but it has one of the biggest hearts in my district and it focuses around the work of Father Lyons of St. Peter's.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

ADDRESS BY HIS EXCELLENCY VACLAV HAVEL, PRESIDENT OF THE CZECHOSLOVAK SOCIALIST REPUBLIC

(The following address was delivered in Czech, with a simultaneous translation in English.)

President HAVEL. Dear Mr. Speaker, dear Mr. President, dear Senators, and Members of the House, ladies and gentlemen:

My advisers advised me to speak on this important occasion in Czech. I don't know why. Perhaps they wanted you to enjoy the sweet sounds of my mother tongue.

The last time they arrested me, on October 27, of last year, I didn't know whether it was for 2 days or 2 years.

Exactly 1 month later, when the rock musician Michael Kocab told me that I would probably be proposed as a Presidential candidate, I thought it was one of his usual jokes.

On the 10th of December 1989, when my actor friend Jiri Bartoska, in the name of the Civic Forum, nominated me as a candidate for the office of President of the Republic, I thought it was out of the question that the Parliament we had inherited from the previous regime would elect me.

Nineteen days later, when I was unanimously elected President of my country, I had no idea that in 2 months later I would be speaking in front of this famous and powerful assembly, and that what I say would be heard by millions of people who have never heard of me and that hundreds of politicians and political scientists would study every word I say.

When they arrested me on October 27, I was living in a country ruled by the most conservative Communist government in Europe, and our society slumbered beneath the pall of a totalitarian system. Today, less than 4 months later, I am speaking to you as the representative of a country that has set out on the road to democracy, a country where there is complete freedom of speech, which is getting ready for free elections, and which wants to create a prosperous market economy and its own foreign policy.

It is all very extraordinary.

But I have not come here to speak for myself or my feelings, or merely to talk about my own country. I have used this small example of something I know well, to illustrate something general and important.

We are living in very extraordinary times. The human face of the world is changing so rapidly that none of the familiar political speedometers are adequate.

We playwrights, who have to cram a whole human life or an entire historical era in a 2-hour play, can scarcely understand this rapidity ourselves. And if it gives us trouble, think of the trouble it must give to political scientists, who spend their whole lives studying the realm of the probable. And have even less experience with the realm of the improbable than us, the playwrights.

Let me try to explain why I think the velocity of the changes in my country, in Central and Eastern Europe, and of course in the Soviet Union itself, has made such a significant impression on the face of the world today, and why it concerns the fate of us all, including you Americans. I would like to look at this, first from the political point of view, and then from a point of view that we might call philosophical.

Twice in this century, the world has been threatened by a catastrophe; twice this catastrophe was born in Europe, and twice you Americans, along with others, were called upon to save Europe, the whole world and yourselves. The first rescue mission—among other things—provided significant help to us Czechs and Slovaks.

Thanks to the great support of your President Wilson, our first President, Tomas Garrigue Masaryk, could found our modern independent state. He founded it, as you know, on the same principles on which the United States of America had been founded, as Masaryk's manuscripts held by the Library of Congress testify.

In the meantime, the United States made enormous strides. It became the most powerful nation on Earth, and it understood the responsibility that flowed from this. Proof of this are the hundreds of thousands of your young citizens who gave their lives for the liberation of Europe, and the graves of American airmen and soldiers on Czechoslovak soil.

But something else was happening as well: the Soviet Union appeared, grew, and transformed the enormous sacrifices of its people suffering under totalitarian rule, into a strength that, after World War II, made it the second most powerful nation in the world. It was a country that rightly gave people nightmares, because no one knew what would occur to its rulers next and what country they would decide to conquer and drag into their sphere of influence, as it is called in political language.

All of this taught us to see the world in bipolar terms, as two enormous forces, one a defender of freedom, the other a source of nightmares. Europe became the point of friction between these two powers and thus it turned into a single enormous arsenal divided into two parts. In this process, one half of the arsenal became part of that nightmarish power, while the other—the free part—bordering on the ocean and having no wish to be driven into it, was compelled, together with you, to build a complicated security system, to which we probably owe the fact that we still exist.

So you may have contributed to the salvation of us Europeans, of the world and thus of yourselves for a third time: you have helped us to survive until today—without a hot war this time—but merely a cold one.

And now what is happening is happening: the totalitarian system in the Soviet Union and in most of its satellites is breaking down and our nations are looking for a way to democracy and independence. The first act in this remarkable drama began when Mr. Gorbachev and those around him, faced with the sad reality of their country, initiated their policy of "perestroika." Obviously they had no idea either what they were setting in motion or how rapidly events would unfold. We knew a lot about the enormous number of growing problems that slumbered beneath the honeyed, unchanging mask of socialism. But I don't think any of us knew how little it would take for these problems to manifest themselves in all their enormity, and for the longings of these nations to emerge in all their strength. The mask fell away so rapidly that, in the flood of work, we have literally no time even to be astonished.

What does all this mean for the world in the long run? Obviously a number of things. This is, I am firmly convinced, a historically irreversible process, and as a result Europe will begin again to seek its own identity without being compelled to be a divided armory any longer. Perhaps this will create the hope that sooner or later your boys will no longer have to stand on guard for freedom in Europe, or come to our rescue, because Europe will at last be able to stand guard over itself. But that is still not the most important thing: the main thing is, it seems to me, that these revolutionary changes will enable us to escape from the rather antiquated straitjacket of this bipolar view of the world, and to enter at last into an era of multipolarity. That is, into an era in which all of us—large and small—former slaves and former masters—will be able to create what your great President Lincoln called the family of man. Can you imagine what a relief this would be to that part of the world which for some reason is called the Third World, even though it is the largest?

I don't think it's appropriate simply to generalize, so let me be specific:

First, as you certainly know, most of the big wars and other conflagrations over the centuries have traditionally begun and ended on the territory of modern Czechoslovakia, or else they were somehow related to that area. Let the Second World War stand as the most recent example. This is understandable: whether we like it or not, we are located in the very heart of Europe, and thanks to this, we have no view of the sea, and no real navy. I mention this because political stability in our country has traditionally been important for the whole of Europe. This is still true today. Our government of national understanding, our present Federal Assembly, the other bodies of the state and I myself will personally guarantee this stability until we hold free elections, planned for June. We understand the terribly complex reasons, domestic political reasons above all, why the Soviet Union cannot withdraw its troops from our territory as quickly as they arrived in 1968. We understand that the arsenals built there over the past 20 years cannot be dismantled and removed overnight. Nevertheless, in our bilateral negotiations with the Soviet Union, we would like to have as many Soviet units as possible moved out of our country before the elections, in the interests of political stability. The more successful our negotiations, the more those who are elected in our places will be able to guarantee political stability in our country even after the elections.

Second, I often hear the question: How can the United States of America help us today? My reply is as paradoxical as the whole of my life has been: You can help us most of all if you help the Soviet Union on its irreversible, but immensely complicated road to democracy. It is far more complicated than the road open to its former European satellites. You yourselves know best how to support, as rapidly as possible, the nonviolent evolution of this enormous, multinational body politic toward democracy and autonomy for all of its peoples. Therefore, it is not fitting for me to offer you any advice. I can only say that the sooner, the more quickly, and the more peacefully the Soviet Union begins to move along the road toward genuine political pluralism, respect for the rights of nations to their own integrity and to a working—that is a market—economy, the better it will be, not just for Czechs and Slovaks, but for the whole world. And the sooner you yourselves will be able to reduce the burden of the military budget borne by the American people. To put it metaphorically: The millions you give to the East today will soon return to you in the form of billions in savings.

Third, it is not true that the Czech writer Vaclav Havel wishes to dissolve the Warsaw Pact tomorrow and then NATO the day after that, as some eager journalists have written. Vaclav Havel merely thinks what he has already said here, that for another hundred years, American soldiers shouldn't have to be separated from their mothers just because Europe is incapable of being a guarantor of world peace, which it ought to be, in order to make some amends, at least, for having given the world two world wars. Sooner or later Europe must recover and come into its own, and decide for itself how many of whose soldiers it needs so that its own security, and all the wider implications of that security, may radiate peace into the whole world. Vaclav Havel cannot make decisions about things that are not proper for him to decide. He is merely putting in a good word for genuine peace, and for achieving it quickly.

Fourth, Czechoslovakia thinks that the planned summit conference of countries participating in the Helsinki process should take place soon, and that in addition to what it wants to accomplish, it should aim to hold the so-called Helsinki II conference earlier than 1992, as originally planned. Above all, we feel it could be something far more significant than has so far seemed possible. We think that Helsinki II should become something equivalent to the European peace conference, which has not yet been held; one that would finally put a formal end to the Second World War and all its unhappy consequences. Such a conference would officially bring a future democratic Germany, in the process of unifying itself, into a new pan-European structure which could decide about its own security system. This system would naturally require some connection with that part of the globe we might label the "Helsinki" part, stretching westward from Vladiovostok all the way to Alaska. The borders of the European states, which by the way should become gradually less important, should finally be legally guaranteed by a common, regular treaty. It should be more than obvious that the basis for such a treaty would have to be general respect for human rights, genuine political pluralism and genuinely free elections.

Fifth, naturally we welcome the initiative of President Bush, which was essentially accepted by Mr. Gorbachev as well, according to which the number of American and Soviet troops in Europe should be radically reduced. It is a magnificent shot in the arm for the Vienna disarmament talks and creates favorable conditions not only for our own efforts to achieve the quickest possible departure of Soviet troops from Czechoslovakia, but indirectly as well for our own intention to make considerable cuts in the Czechoslovak Army, which is disproportionately large in relation to our population. If Czechoslovakia were forced to defend itself against anyone, which we hope will not happen, then it will be capable of doing so with a considerably smaller army, because this time its defense would be—not only after decades but after even centuries—supported by the common and indivisible will of both its nations and its leadership. Our freedom, independence, and our newborn democracy have been purchased at great cost, and we shall not surrender them. For the sake of order, I should add that whatever steps we take are not intended to complicate the Vienna disarmament talks, but on the contrary, to facilitate them.

Sixth, Czechoslovakia is returning to Europe. In the general interest and in its own interest as well, it wants to coordinate this return—both politically and economically—with the other returnees, which means, above all, with its neighbors the Poles and the Hungarians. We are doing what we can to coordinate these returns. And at the same time, we are doing what we can so that Europe will be capable of really accepting us, its wayward children. Which means that it may open itself to us, and may begin to transform its structures—which are formally European but de facto Western European—in that direction, but in such a way that it will not be to its detriment, but rather to its advantage.

Seventh, I have already said this in our parliament, and I would like to repeat it here, in this Congress, which is architecturally far more attractive: for many years, Czechoslovakia—as someone's meaningless satellite—has refused to face up honestly to its coresponsibility for the world. It has a lot to make up for. If I dwell on this and so many important things, it is only because I feel—along with my fellow citizens—a sense of culpability for our former reprehensible passivity, and a rather ordinary sense of indebtedness.

Eighth, we are of course delighted that your country is so readily lending its support to our fresh efforts to renew democracy. Both our peoples were deeply moved by the generous offers made a few days ago in Prague at the Charles University, one of the oldest in Europe, by your Secretary of State, Mr. James Baker. We are ready to sit down and talk about them.

Ladies and gentlemen, I've only been president for 2 months and I haven't attended any schools for presidents. My only school was life itself. Therefore I don't want to burden you any longer with my political thoughts, but instead I will move on to an area that is more familiar to me, to what I would call the philosophical aspect of those changes that still concern everyone, although they are taking place in our corner of the world.

As long as people are people, democracy in the full sense of the word will always be no more than an ideal; one may approach it as one would a horizon, in ways that may be better or worse, but it can never be fully attained. In this sense you too are merely approaching democracy. You have thousands of problems of all kinds, as other countries do. But you have one great advantage: You have been approaching democracy uninterruptedly for more than 200 years, and your journey toward the horizon has never been disrupted by a totalitarian system. Czechs and Slovaks, despite their humanistic traditions that go back to the first millennium, have approached democracy for a mere 20 years, between the two world wars, and now for the 3½ months since the 17th of November of last year.

The advantage that you have over us is obvious at once.

The Communist type of totalitarian system has left both our nations, Czechs and Slovaks—as it has all the nations of the Soviet Union and the other countries the Soviet Union subjugated in its time—a legacy of countless dead, an infinite spectrum of human suffering, profound economic decline, and above all enormous human humiliation. It has brought us horrors that fortunately you have not known.

At the same time, however—unintentionally, of course—it has given us something positive: a special capacity to look, from time to time, somewhat further than someone who has not undergone this bitter experience. A person who cannot move and live a somewhat normal life because he is pinned under a boulder has more time to think about his hopes than someone who is not trapped that way.

What I am trying to say is this: we must all learn many things from you, from how to educate our offspring, how to elect our representatives, all the way to how to organize our economic life so that it will lead to prosperity and not to poverty. But it doesn't have to be merely assistance from the well-educated, the powerful and the wealthy to someone who has nothing and therefore has nothing to offer in return.

We too can offer something to you: our experience and the knowledge that has come from it.

This is a subject for books, many of which have already been written and many of which have yet to be written. I shall therefore limit myself to a single idea.

The specific experience I'm talking about has given me one great certainty: Consciousness precedes Being, and not the other way around, as the Marxists claim.

For this reason, the salvation of this human world lies nowhere else than in the human heart, in the human power to reflect, in human meekness and in human responsibility.

Without a global revolution in the sphere of human consciousness, nothing will change for the better in the sphere of our Being as humans, and the catastrophe toward which this world is headed, be it ecological, social, demographic or a general breakdown of civilization, will be unavoidable. If we are no longer threatened by world war, or by the danger that the absurd mountains of accumulated nuclear weapons might blow up the world, this does not mean that we have definitively won. We are in fact far from the final victory.

We are still a long way from that "family of man"; in fact, we seem to be receding from the ideal rather than drawing closer to it. Interests of all kinds: personal, selfish, state, national, group and, if you like, company interests still considerably outweigh genuinely common and global interests. We are still under the sway of the destructive and vain belief that man is the pinnacle of creation, and not just a part of it, and that therefore everything is permitted. There are still many who say they are concerned not for themselves, but for the cause, while they are demonstrably out for themselves and not for the cause at all. We are still destroying the planet that was entrusted to us, and its environment. We still close our eyes to the growing social, ethnic and cultural conflicts in the world. From time to time we say that the anonymous megamachinery we have created for ourselves no longer serves us, but rather has enslaved us, yet we still fail to do anything about it.

In other words, we still don't know how to put morality ahead of politics, science and economics. We are still incapable of understanding that the only genuine backbone of all our actions—if they are to be moral—is responsibility. Responsibility to something higher than my family, my country, my company, my success. Responsibility to the order of Being, where all our actions are indelibly recorded and where, and only where, they will be properly judged.

The interpreter or mediator between us and this higher authority is what is traditionally referred to as human conscience.

If I subordinate my political behavior to this imperative mediated to me by my conscience, I can't go far wrong. If on the contrary I were not guided by this voice, not even 10 presidential schools with 2,000 of the best political scientists in the world could help me.

This is why I ultimately decided—after resisting for a long time—to accept the burden of political responsibility.

I am not the first, nor will I be the last, intellectual to do this. On the contrary, my feeling is that there will be more and more of them all the time. If the hope of the world lies in human consciousness, then it is obvious that intellectuals cannot go on forever avoiding their share of responsibility for the world and hiding their distaste for politics under an alleged need to be independent.

It is easy to have independence in your program and then leave others to carry that program out. If everyone thought that way, pretty soon no one would be independent.

I think that you Americans should understand this way of thinking. Wasn't it the best minds of your country, people you could call intellectuals, who wrote your famous Declaration of Independence, your Bill of Human Rights and your Constitution and who—above all—took upon themselves the practical responsibility for putting them into practice? The worker from Branik in Prague that your President referred to in his State of the Union message this year is far from being the only person in Czechoslovakia, let alone in the world, to be inspired by those great documents. They inspire us all. They inspire us despite the fact that they are over 200 years old. They inspire us to be citizens.

When Thomas Jefferson wrote that, "Governments are instituted among Men deriving their just Powers from the Consent of the Governed," it was a simple and important act of the human spirit.

What gave meaning to that act, however, was the fact that the author backed it up with his life. It was not just his words, it was his deeds as well.

I will end where I began: history has accelerated. I believe that once again, it will be the human mind that will notice this acceleration, give it a name, and transform those words into deeds.

Thank you.

[Applause, the Members rising.]

At 12 o'clock and 14 minutes p.m. the President of the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic, accompanied by the committee of escort, retired from the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The Doorkeeper escorted the invited guests from the Chamber in the following order.

The members of the President's Cabinet.

The Ambassadors, Ministers, and chargés d'affaires of foreign governments.

Accordingly, at 12 o'clock and 18 minutes p.m., the joint meeting of the two Houses was dissolved.

The Members of the Senate retired to their Chamber.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The House will continue in recess until the hour of 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. MAZZOLI] at 1 o'clock and 3 minutes p.m.

PRINTING OF PROCEEDINGS HAD DURING RECESS

Mr. NAGLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings had during the recess be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

NEW WAVE OF FREEDOM PATTERNED AFTER FOUNDING FATHERS

(Mr. HOYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, freedom's bell rang today on the floor of this House. If we might refer to Vaclav Havel as the Thomas Jefferson of Czechoslovakia, we would be correct. This poet-playright-philosopher President of Czechoslovakia spoke of the values of free peoples.

He spoke of the values that our American forefathers spread before the world and before our own country. President Havel thanked us all for the young men, the young women, and the mothers and fathers who made sacrifices to preserve and protect freedom.

He talked about Woodrow Wilson, that President who during the first World War led America to make the world safe for democracy. Perhaps he failed in the effort to make it safe for democracy, but President Wilson did in fact spread the idea of democracy that Jefferson had so eloquently articulated.

And it was President Truman who, after the Second World War, said that we will stand and defend freedom, that we will not allow the Iron Curtain to be spread across Europe.

It was that courage and that leadership from Jefferson, Wilson, and Truman that has stood democracy and freedom in good stead and led to President Havel's speech today.

John Kennedy went to Berlin and he said, "Ich bin ein Berliner" and identified every American with freedom and democracy and the human values of which President Havel spoke today.

THE INSPIRATION OF PRESIDENT HAVEL'S WORDS

(Mr. CONTE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, today, we were privileged in this exalted hall to listen to one of the great moral leaders of our time, Vaclav Havel, the quiet playwright, the citizen leader, the President of Czechoslovakia.

His message was inspired as he described for us these "extraordinary times * * * which leave us no time even to be astonished."

The sweet sounds of his mother tongue were sweet sounds indeed. Not only did he lift our collective spirits on what public service should be all about, he reached an even higher plane, in my opinion.

In all of those sweet sounds, there was not one request for money for his own nation. It is like a revolution within the revolution.

Mr. Speaker, in my 32 years in the House of Representatives, I have heard many addresses before joint sessions. But I have never heard a more inspiring and powerful one than we heard today. I almost felt as if I was in the presence of our own Founding Fathers. There was a reverence in this room, I don't know how else to describe it.

With leadership like Vaclav Havel, we can look ahead with hope and confidence in a better, more moral world in our future.

FREEDOM PREVAILS, A GREAT MOMENT FOR DEMOCRACY

(Mr. NAGLE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. NAGLE. Mr. Speaker. President Vaclav Havel's visit to the Congress this morning, was a great moment for democracy. For the first time in decades, Czechoslovakia is no longer a victim of tyranny, but one of Europe's newest democracies; its leader, no longer a despot, but the elected choice of the people.

As we celebrate what the people of Czechoslovakia have accomplished, it is also appropriate to recognize and honor those Americans whose leadership helped keep the dream of democracy alive during the dark years of oppression throughout Eastern Europe:

President Harry Truman, who moved quickly to plant democracy's flag in the rubble of Europe after World War II, with the Marshall plan;

President John F. Kennedy, who inspired a new generation of lovers of freedom with his historic speech at the Berlin Wall;

President Jimmy Carter, who made respect for fundamental human rights a major concern and value in U.S. foreign policy.

While the names I have mentioned here are Democrats, I certainly do not mean to imply that our efforts were partisan. Far from it.

Presidents from both parties supported and worked to strengthen NATO, to secure the Helsinki accords and Helsinki process, and made countless other important contributions over the years.

But in the final analysis, as in Czechoslovakia, the most important contribution was made by the people. It was the American people who supported and paid for Harry Truman's Marshall plan; it was the American spirit President Kennedy expressed at the Berlin Wall; and it was the deeply held values of the American people President Carter championed in his foreign policy.

This is a great day for democracy.

And it is a great day for the American people. We stood with freedom in the face of a long, cold, and bitter wind. And freedom has prevailed.

A TRIBUTE TO HERMINE BECKETT HANNA ON ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL GRANDPARENTS DAY

(Mr. WALSH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize an outstanding individual, a woman who has dedicated her life to community service. Hermine Beckett Hanna has spent 30 years of her life enriching the lives of senior citizens and gaining recognition for grandparents.

As a result of her continued efforts over those years, grandparents have had a day to call their own. As you know, National Grandparents Day has been celebrated every year since 1979. Hermine's efforts have touched thousands of seniors, including two distinguished former Members of this House, the Honorable William F. Walsh and the late Honorable Claude Pepper, who were with Hermine as she began her endeavor in 1961.

Building on a theme that is gaining momentum in the United States, Hermine has directed her attention to educating the young in our community to the important contributions senior citizens have made, and to the important contributions they are willing to make if asked. Hermine urges the young to adopt a grandparent, not for 1 day a year, not for material giving, but for a lifetime of experience and caring just waiting to be shared with others.

And so, my fellow colleagues, I am pleased to bring Hermine to your attention for her important role in the establishment of Grandparents Day. Her commitment is an example to the Nation, and I wish her well in bringing her message to the children of today, and the grandparents of tomorrow.

LAKE CHAMPLAIN ENVIRONMENTAL CONTROL LEGISLATION

(Mr. MARTIN of New York asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MARTIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, today I am joining with my colleague from Vermont, Representative PETER SMITH, in introducing legislation to address current, as well as future, environmental problems in Lake Champlain.

As the sixth largest fresh water lake in the United States, as well as an international body of water, the ecological well-being of Lake Champlain is important to the United States and Canada, alike. Maintaining its recreational, social, and economic assets is important to the surrounding residents, industrial interests and governmental entities. The 600-square-mile lake is suffering environmental damage from point as well nonpoint source pollution. Coordinated management of these resources is imperative and long overdue.

The legislation we are introducing authorizes $25 million to create and implement a 5-year pollution control and restoration program for Lake Champlain. The program includes a management conference to coordinate Federal, State, and local action in the effort. Identical legislation has been introduced in the other body by New York Senators D'AMATO and MOYNIHAN and Vermont Senators JEFFORDS and LEAHY. In 1988, the States of New York and Vermont, and the Canadian province of Quebec entered into a memorandum of understanding to conduct cooperative planning and research for management, protection, and enhancement of Lake Champlain and its environment. Clearly, this is a bipartisan effort to address environmental problems which will not resolve themselves.

The citizens of New York and Vermont have demonstrated their commitment to restoring the environmental integrity of Lake Champlain. The Federal Government must now lend its assistance in this important endeavor, as it has for other water resources vital to our Nation. We must protect all of our waterways from environmental damage, and Lake Champlain is no exception. It deserves our ongoing attention and protection.

We cannot delay any further. Action must be taken now to enact into law the Lake Champlain Special Designation Act. We owe it to current, as well as future, generations of Americans to take responsible action before it really is too late.

TRIBUTE TO MEN AND WOMEN WHO RISKED THEIR LIVES TO SAVE OTHERS IN LOMA PRIETA EARTHQUAKE

(Mr. MINETA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, on October 17, 1989, the Loma Prieta earthquake struck northern California.

On February 24, 1990, community leaders from throughout my home of Santa Clara County will gather together in a special tribute to the men and women who risked their lives to save others.

We will salute the brave members of the U.S. Navy, U.S. Air Force, and the California Air National Guard who rescued the injured and helped hold our communities together during the crisis.

We will salute their selflessness and the selflessness of their colleagues at Moffett Field Naval Air Station, Onizuka Air Force Base, and throughout the South Bay.

Mr. Speaker, I witnessed the devastation of the earthquake zone. There were many acts of bravery in the aftermath of the disaster. But I can say without fear of contradiction that the contributions of the Navy, Air Force, and Air National Guard will never be forgotten by the people of Santa Clara County.

LAKE CHAMPLAIN PROTECTION BILL

(Mr. SMITH of Vermont asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SMITH of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of this Chamber legislation that my honorable colleague from New York, DAVE O'B. MARTIN, and I have introduced—the Lake Champlain Special Designation Act. It is landmark legislation that is badly needed to protect a great body of water joining our two States from the deadly effects of pollution.

For years we have worried about the increasing pressures of development of this beautiful and plentiful resource, in terms of fisheries and water quality. Now, with passage of this bill, we have the chance to prevent those damages before they occur while cleaning up the effects of old disasters.

I believe this is a model piece of legislation. It seeks to establish an ecologically sound management scheme, early enough in the game to ensure a healthy lake well into the next century.

In introducing this legislation, I would like to commend the members of the two delegations for working together in protecting Lake Champlain. Using this bill as a springboard, future generations of Vermonters and New Yorkers will be able to put their strong environmental convictions into practice, and save this lake as an invaluable natural resource for all Americans.

A THOUSAND MORE IRS AGENTS—FOR WHAT?

(Mr. TRAFICANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, the IRS has become a very expensive maid service for the rich of this country, and they are not a very good one at that. They have testified before committees that they need 1,000 new collection agents because there are 3,385 Americans that owe at least $1 million apiece in back taxes.

Think about that. How could anybody who lives in a basement apartment owe the Government that much money? These are rich people. Now what is going on here?

Congress wants tax cuts for the rich. For what? I say, "The rich ain't paying any taxes anyway."

In addition, Mr. Speaker, what are we going to do with the 1,000 new agents? Are we going to go after truck drivers? Taxicab drivers? Teachers? Housewives? Preachers? Farmers? Even Members of Congress like me?

Mr. Speaker, I am sick and tired of it. Congress should start straightening out our tax problems by straightening out the IRS of this country.

Think about it.

THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE DEATH OF MALCOLM X

(Mr. FLAKE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. FLAKE. Mr. Speaker, today I come on the floor on this the 25th anniversary of the death of Malcolm X, perhaps one of the most misunderstood figures in human history and certainly one of the most misunderstood as it relates to the civil rights movement. He was not a passivist, and he was controversial and challenging. Therefore may people did not understand the total depth of his message.

Mr. Speaker, Malcolm X's real message was one of self-help, education, economic independence, and self-reliance. If he were living today, I suspect because he talked about the pride and dignity that should be exemplified by those who are African-Americans, he would be appalled to discover that there were more African-American men in jails than in colleges. He would certainly be appalled to discover the scourge of drugs that has swept the communities. Here was a man of pride, dignity, and self-respect, and, after his trip to Mecca, he came back and talked about an inclusion of all people and understanding of the necessity for all people to exemplify pride, dignity, and self-respect.

So, on this, the 25th anniversary of the death of Malcolm X, we salute his widow, Betty Shabazz, and we say to the memory of Malcolm, "Thank you for your legacy."

THE EMERGENCY FEDERAL JUDGESHIP ACT OF 1990

(Mr. SMITH of Texas asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, today our Nation faces a critical shortage of Federal judges. Despite the growing workload of the Federal courts, Congress has not created any new judgeships since 1984.

Today I am introducing the Emergency Federal Judgeship Act, a bill to provide for the creation of 20 new judicial positions. The assignment of these positions will be based on the needs of those Federal district courts that have been most severely impacted by the increase in drug crime related cases.

Federal courts have witnessed an explosion in the number of criminal cases filed, particularly those related to drug felonies.

As we commit more resources and manpower to our drug enforcement and interdiction efforts, the strain on the Federal courts will increase.

Top priority must go to the areas where the drug war has put the greatest demand on our criminal justice system.

I strongly urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this much-needed legislation.

THE TIRE RECYCLING INCENTIVES ACT

(Mr. TORRES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, are you aware that for the past week millions of tires have burned out of control at an Ontario, Canada tire dump? This is an environmental catastrophe.

Nearby creeks have been contaminated by the chemical waste-water running from the mountains of burning tires; 1,600 residents have been evacuated.

Farmers have been told not to let their livestock drink the contaminated water because high levels of benzene and phenols were found in the water. This water is contaminated at levels thousands of times higher than levels considered safe. Phenols and benzene cause cancer as well as skin, eye, liver, kidney, and nervous system damage.

Almost 50,000 gallons of oil have been skimmed from the area. Now, the heavily contaminated oil is threatening the ground water.

Tire piles are a universal problem. EPA has estimated that America has 2½ to 3 billion tires stockpiled all across the country. And, at least 10 of these tire piles catch on fire each year. One tire fire alone, in Winchester, VA, burned out of control for 8 months and cost almost $5 million to control.

Tire piles pose a serious problem. Letting these tires sit around, waiting to catch on fire is dangerous and moreover is a waste of a valuable resource.

Tires can, and should be recycled into useful products, like: Rubber-modified asphalt for road construction, or tire derived fuel, as well as a host of other useful products. However, recycling is not occurring because the laws of supply and demand are working against us.

It is cheaper to throw the tire on to the side of the road than to recycle the tire into the road. We have the power to change the market for recycled tire products.

Next week, along with 32 of my colleagues, I will introduce the Tire Recycling Incentives Act, in order to give scrap tires a positive value in the marketplace.

The Tire Recycling Incentives Act would require the tire manufacturer to guarantee that a certain percentage of the tires manufactured are recycled.

The tire manufacturer could achieve the goal by using reclaimed rubber in the manufacture of new tires or by purchasing recycling credits from a licensed tire recycler.

By instituting this system we will accomplish the twin goals of reducing the danger from the tire piles and increasing the market for recycled used tires.

This market incentive legislation will also be introduced in the Senate by Senator WIRTH and Senator HEINZ, and I would like to urge the rest of my colleagues to join us as well.

INTRODUCTION OF NATIONAL DISASTER PREPAREDNESS INVENTORY ACT

(Mr. WELDON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WELDON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce legislation critical to our Nation's ability to respond to major natural disasters. Last fall, Hurricane Hugo ripped through the Eastern part of the United States and Loma Prieta earthquake devastated northern California leaving behind overwhelmed State and local emergency responders looking to the Federal Government for help.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency [FEMA], whose charter directs it to provide disaster assistance, was in many cases unable to provide adequate information and resources to these distressed areas.

When I toured northern California with three of my House colleagues and the head of the U.S. Fire Administration, I was amazed to learn that FEMA could not provide local emergency responders with a comprehensive computerized list of the skilled personnel and critical equipment which could be used for time-sensitive urban search and rescue operations.

For this reason, I am offering legislation which will specifically direct FEMA to create an active involvement of the people and resources that can be made available to local emergency responders. Giving these on-site experts the ability to analyze their needs for outside assistance will permit FEMA to provide faster and more beneficial aid.

Mr. Speaker, this bill already has 29 bipartisan cosponsors. For most emergencies, the State and local personnel have the training and equipment necessary. For more serious disasters, such as the ones we saw last fall, FEMA ought to be prepared to step in and provide timely and thorough assistance.

PRESIDENT HAVEL AND HUMAN RIGHTS

(Ms. PELOSI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, as a number of our previous speakers have mentioned today, we had the great experience of having the President of Czechoslovakia, President Havel, address the body. His speech brought the Members of Congress to their feet as he stirred us with his remarks about democracy and human rights.

Today also, Mr. Speaker, the administration's human rights report on China is being presented to the House Foreign Affairs Committee. It reads as an indictment of Deng Xiaoping. It reads as a description of a massacre that took place in June and the repression that continues and has intensified since then. These two events, President Havel's address about democracy and the human rights report, are related not only by their timing before the House, but also by their relationship to principle.

In his remarks, President Havel said:

If I subordinate my political behavior to this imperative mediated to me by my conscience, I can't go far wrong. If on the contrary I were not guided by this voice, not even ten presidential schools with two thousand of the best political scientists in the world could help me.

When the House voted to support the Chinese students, it brought honor upon this House. In light of President Havel's remarks, I wonder how Members of the Senate who voted against the students can explain in conscience their vote to their children, to their own children.

More will follow on the human rights report when Congress comes into session next week.

HOME RULE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA IS A DISASTER

(Mr. McEWEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. McEWEN. This morning, Mr. Speaker, hundreds of thousands of man-hours were lost because a car sitting on Interstate 395 was there for well over an hour blocking traffic for over 20 miles to get into the District.

Mr. Speaker, we do not expect a great deal out of the D.C. government. We do not expect them to maintain decent roads. We do not expect them to maintain decent order; but the least we could ask of them is the capacity to direct traffic.

The total incompetence of the D.C. government in Washington, DC, has become an embarrassment to our entire Nation. This experiment in home rule is a disaster. All of us who serve in this Chamber, well over 95 percent of us, have held other positions in government. We have been mayors. We have been township trustees, State legislators, and the rest. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that there are well over 2,000 township trustees in my congressional district who with one arm tied behind their backs, could blindfolded do a better job of directing this city than the city council of D.C.

Mr. Speaker, it is high time that this experiment in home rule that has proven to be a disaster for our Nation be terminated, that we return to some sort of logical government whereby the rest of us can function in this city.

CZECH DESCENDANTS IN NEBRASKA HONORED BY PRESIDENT HAVEL'S ADDRESS

(Mr. BEREUTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that I am among all of us who were very pleased and honored to have the address to the joint session of Congress by President Havel, the President of Czechoslovakia. As a Congressman who represents probably more people of Czech-American ancestry than any Member of the Congress, people who have typically been in our State for four and five generations, it was a particular pleasure to hear those remarks and to recall how through the months of November and December people in my district in small communities and large, gathered in front of television sets to watch the velvet revolution unveiled in Prague and other cities of Czechoslovakia.

I have noted with some interest that the leaders of the new Czech Government have not asked for financial assistance. They have asked for an opportunity to learn from us, an opportunity for trade relations to improve between our two countries.

I call the attention of my colleagues to three bills that I have introduced over the last 3 weeks, legislation which would provide for the OPIC Insurance Program to American businesses doing business in Czechoslovakia, eligibility for the Eximbank, and just yesterday a resolution urging Congress to grant, with the assistance of President Bush who has now called for it, most-favored-nation status to Czechoslovakia.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 2570, ARIZONA DESERT WILDERNESS ACT OF 1989

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 338 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 338

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 2570) to provide for the designation of certain public lands as wilderness in the State of Arizona, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and which shall not exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs now printed in the bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the five-minute rule and each section shall be considered as having been read. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MAZZOLI). The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HALL] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. PASHAYAN], for purposes of debate only, pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 338 is an open rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 2570, the Arizona Desert Wilderness Act of 1990. The rule provides for 1 hour of general debate to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

The rule also makes in order the Interior Committee amendment in the nature of a substitute now printed in the bill as an original text for the purpose of amendment under the 5-minute rule. Each section shall be considered as having been read.

Finally, the rule provides for one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 2570 would designate approximately 1.1 million acres of wilderness on Bureau of Land Management [BLM] Lands in Arizona. It would designate 39 wilderness areas, and thereby protect magnificent desert environments in our country. In addition, the bill would release almost 950,000 acres to multiple use management.

The bill, Mr. Speaker, is the result of hearings and careful consultations, I would urge my colleagues to adopt this rule.

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 338 is an open rule under which the House shall consider legislation designating over 1 million acres of wilderness in Arizona.

The bill made in order by this rule, H.R. 2570, is not scheduled to come before the House until next week. The rule provides that the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs amendment, which is printed in the bill, shall be original text for the purpose of amendment. The bill shall be considered by sections, with each section considered as read.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the rule provides for one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The bill made in order by this rule would designate 39 areas as wilderness, would leave two areas in wilderness-study status, and would organize a third area as a national conservation area.

The bill also would release almost 950,000 acres from interim-wilderness management status to multiple use status.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RHODES] appeared before the Committee on Rules on Tuesday and said that enactment of this bill would be premature because a companion bill, H.R. 2571, is not ready for consideration.

In addition, the administration opposes enactment of H.R. 2570, because many of the areas designated in the bill are still being studied by the Department of the Interior, and the review called for in current law should be completed before final wilderness designations should be made.

Mr. Speaker, the rule is not a matter of controversy and I urge its adoption.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. KOLBE].

Mr. KOLBE. Mr. Speaker, I want to rise today to support the open rule for consideration of H.R. 2570, which is known as the Arizona Wilderness Act. I hope next week when this bill is considered we will not see any exciting theater. I do not believe we will, because I think most of the difficult issues have been resolved in a lot of very careful meetings that have taken place between delegation members, staff, and all interested parties in Arizona have been working so long, literally for the last 3 years, on this piece of legislation, a process leading all the way last week through committee markup.

I want to pay special tribute to the chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL], for the way he has handled this bill and for his willingness to listen to the concerns that others among the delegation and people in Arizona have expressed about various aspects of the legislation.

I would express my concern about the need to resolve the water rights language as it is in this bill. That is one of the reasons we have an open rule, so as we work out this disagreement or this language we will be able to offer that on the floor next week.

I would say that a failure to reach an agreement between the committee and members of the Arizona delegation could cause problems on the floor, and more importantly I think it would cause very serious problems for the legislation in the Senate. This legislation has come too far for us to let that kind of failure occur.

Members and staff have been very successful in reaching agreement to preempt the problems. It would be a shame if this one important generic issue causes unfortunate problems for what I think all Members would agree otherwise is a very meritorious bill.

All in all, the bill is a successful effort to preserve the unique character of Arizona's wild heritage for future visitors and residents alike.

In addition to the water issue I would mention just one unresolved issue that affects an area in my part of the State, a difficult question of jurisdiction relating to the Black Rock Wash Road that leads to the North Santa Theresa Wilderness Area included in H.R. 2570.

This road runs through the San Carlos Apache Indian Reservation. It provides the only access to the wilderness area, as well as privately owned ranch lands for approximately three families. I will offer an amendment on the floor which will clarify the rights of private property owners, land managers, visitors and the tribe relative to problems and conflicts arising from access on this road to the area under consideration. I am continuing to work with all the relevant parties to come to an agreement about how access along this road should be managed.

Mr. Speaker, let me say in a more general way that H.R. 2570 sets aside 1.1 million acres of BLM lands as wilderness. These lands consist of dramatic canyons, winding streams, rugged mountains, and unique desert plains. Just as importantly, however, in this legislation we are going to release 900,000 acres of land from the nether-nether land of wilderness study status and return that land to multiple-use management so that better economic use of that land can be made in the future.

The wilderness decisions we have reached are intended to reflect our respect for the local land managers and for the difficulties they face in managing hundreds of thousands of acres of lands.

These individuals, the ones who actually walk and work the land that we are discussing, are the best qualified to make the difficult management decisions, in consultation with the citizens who have a stake in how that land is to be used.

We should be grateful those lands in and out of wilderness are both being supervised by experts with a deep and abiding interest in promoting the utilization and protection of our public lands.

Mr. Speaker, I support the content of the wilderness bill, the bill that will be considered next week on the floor of the House, and I support this open rule which allows for consideration of as yet unresolved matters.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL].

□ 1340

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the rule on H.R. 2570, the Arizona Desert Wilderness Act of 1990. This legislation is of great importance to me personally, the State of Arizona and to the Nation. H.R. 2570 is one-half of a package of wilderness bills that, when enacted, will make Arizona the first State other than Alaska to have substantially completed all its major wilderness reviews.

The other component, H.R. 2571, deals with wilderness on four wildlife refuges in Arizona. Jointly referred to the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, it will be ready for House consideration in the near future.

I introduced H.R. 2570 last June, after the Arizona State office of the Bureau of Land Management had completed its job under section 603 of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act by reviewing and making recommendations on all its roadless lands for possible designation as wilderness.

BLM had studied more than 2 million acres and recommended about half the total. As introduced, my bill would have designated about 1.4 million acres. The entire Arizona congressional delegation, however, has worked together and worked hard on this most difficult subject to produce a compromise that is fair and balanced. After field hearings in Arizona, an additional hearing in Washington and countless hours of consultations and discussions, we reached agreement on a package that designates about 1.1 million acres of wilderness on BLM lands in Arizona.

The Interior Committee endorsed this package on February 7 by voice vote. The bill protects some of the most magnificent desert environments anywhere in the world, Mr. Speaker. For a long time, these were considered the leftovers, the trash lands nobody thought were good enough for the national forests, parks, and wildlife refuges. Those of us who love the desert always cringed at this notion. Now, more and more people understand how special these lands are. The witnesses at our hearings and the mail from our constituents is overwhelming testimony that Arizonans value these lands and want them protected. Nowhere is the pageant of life more intriguing, the solitude more inspiring and the beauty of nature more impressive.

Contrary to what many believe, however, wilderness does not exclude man. So we have provided in this legislation language that protects grazing rights and provides for the modern management of wildlife. We have made many, many boundary adjustments and deletions to accommodate mining and other commercial interests. We also have extended, with the help of Representative JIM KOLBE, the very successful model of the San Pedro Riparian National Conservation Area to the controversial Gila Box and associated streams. This classification provides, I think, an excellent blueprint for strong conservation management under the particular circumstances of the Gila River.

We have one very important matter, Mr. Speaker, that we have not been able to resolve and that is the question of Federal reserved water rights for the wilderness set-aside by H.R. 2570. The delegation is not debating whether there should be such rights—we all agree that there should be—but rather how to insure that they be properly adjudicated and quantified. We are continuing to discuss this very important issue and I hope that we will be able to work this out. But in the event that we cannot, an open rule would fully protect everyone's rights.

So we are happy to support this bill and happy to support an open rule on H.R. 2570.

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RHODES].

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I want to speak mostly to the rule and to the situation that faces us next week when we bring the bill to the floor. I want to thank the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL], chairman of the full committee for requesting this open rule, and the Rules Committee itself for agreeing that an open rule is appropriate for consideration of this bill.

As has been noted, the sole reason for needing an open rule is because we do have an issue outstanding. I along with my colleague from Arizona [Mr. KYL] have been working with the chairman and other members of the committee on resolving this issue.

I think at the suggestion of the chairman we may have worked too hard on this, and we may have worked so hard in trying to cover every conceivable eventuality that we have gotten ourselves all messed up in minutia and perhaps it is time for us to go back to the drawing board and come up with some language that we know will address the issues, and yet does not leave itself open to wondering what would happen in the next scenario.

So I am looking forward to continuing to work with the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL], in coming up with a proposal that we can bring to the floor next Wednesday, and have the full support of most of the delegation and certainly of the committee and of the House.

Again, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, having no further requests for time, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, I yield back the balance of my time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MAZZOLI). The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 386, nays 0, not voting 45, as follows:

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. GINGRICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I asked for this 1 minute to proceed for the purpose of receiving the schedule.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished Democratic caucus chairman, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOYER] for the purpose of receiving the schedule.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH], the distinguished minority whip for yielding.

Monday, February 26, the House will meet at 12 noon. There will be no legislative business scheduled.

On Tuesday, February 27, the House will meet at 12 noon. There will be 8 suspensions scheduled:

H.R. 3910, requires the U.S. Department of Education to conduct a comprehensive assessment of programs aided by chapter 1;

H.R. 3315, authorizes funds in fiscal years 1991 and 1992 for the Taft Institute;

H.R. 2544, Public Service Education Assistance Act;

H. Con. Res. 87, concerning Iranian persecution of the Baha'is;

H.R. 4010, provides the Secretary of Agriculture authority regarding the sale of sterile screwworms;

S. 1016, regarding Marion Lake in Marion, KS;

H. Con. Res. 226, acceptance of a statute of Philo T. Farnsworth; and

H. Con. Res. 251, authorizing the use of the rotunda for a dedication ceremony concerning Lajos Kossuth.

On Wednesday, February 28, the House will also meet at 12 noon for the consideration of H.R. 2570, the Arizona Desert Wilderness Act, which will be under an open rule, 1 hour of debate. The rule, of course, has already been adopted.

On Thursday, March 1, the House will meet at 11 a.m. The legislative schedule has not been set for Thursday, but we do have expectations of legislative business on the floor that day. If that is not the case, sufficient notice will be given to apprise Members so that they can plan for Thursday.

On Friday, March 2, the House will not be in session. Conference reports may be brought up at any time, and any further program will be announced later.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me ask my friend, the gentleman from Maryland, first of all, on February 27, do we expect votes late in the day, and by what time should our colleagues expect to be back here?

I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, we do expect votes late in the day, following all of the consideration of those bills. I would say that probably 3 o'clock would be a safe bet. We will make sure that there are no votes before 3 o'clock on the bills themselves. We obviously cannot protect Members against such procedural votes that may be asked.

Mr. GINGRICH. For the purpose of our colleagues, as long as they plan to be back on Tuesday by 3 o'clock, from work in their district.

Let me also ask the gentleman, as I understand, there is a Price-Fixing Prevention Act, H.R. 1236. There is some curiosity on our side as to when it might be brought up, and whether it will be under suspension.

Mr. HOYER. If the gentleman will continue to yield, with respect to the Price-Fixing Act to which the gentleman referred, that has not yet been scheduled, and I cannot answer the mode in which it will be considered when it is, because I do not believe that has been decided.

Mr. GINGRICH. Also I might ask, as the gentleman knows, March will start next Thursday, and we were curious on our side when the Democratic leadership might be releasing a schedule of dates for March, or when planning might be completed for the month which begins a week from tomorrow.

Mr. HOYER. If the gentleman will continue to yield, the leadership expects to have, as soon as we arrive in March, a March schedule for Members' consideration. We think that is reasonable, and we will have it available.

Mr. GINGRICH. Sometime before the end of next week?

Mr. HOYER. Yes, that is correct.

□ 1310

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, let me raise one other issue. I want to do so in part not to put my friend, the gentleman from Maryland, on the spot, but to say to the Democratic leadership that I believe this will be coming up routinely from now on. When we begin in March, it will have been 9 months since the President of the United States sent up his drug and violent crime bill.

I have just introduced a bill today which Senator GRAMM is introducing in the Senate tomorrow, and that is the National Drug and Crime Emergency Act. I recognize as a Member that my bill will go to committee and go through a long process of hearings and being marked up. But it does seem on our side of the aisle that when President Bush sends up a bill on drugs and violent crime and sends it up in June in 1 year, the least we could expect is that at some point, say, within 9 or 10 months, we could have hearings on the bill in the committee and we could have some notification of when the President's proposal might come to the floor, recognizing that the Democratic majority might want to rewrite it or offer its own substitute or do something.

But I think the White House legitimately has a complaint when we have nationally had no sign of any activity after 9 months. I wonder if my colleague might want to comment on this.

I am not trying to put the gentleman on the spot, but this is just sort of serving notice on the Democratic leadership that we are going to be fairly consistent from now on in talking about this particular bill.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Maryland for a response.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia.

I would point out, as the gentleman well knows, that the Democratic leadership and the Republican leadership in both 1986 and 1988 promulgated and passed and sent to the President to be signed major pieces of legislation dealing with the drug crisis in America. That is not to say that we have gone far enough.

As the gentleman knows, the President's package, along with other legislation that has been introduced by Members on both sides of the aisle, is under consideration by the committees, and we would expect a timely report by those committees to supplement the major pieces of legislation that we passed in 1986 and 1988.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, let me just say in what I hope is sort of a very fair and friendly manner that I am appreciative of the new tone of the leadership over the last 8 or 9 months, but at the same time I think we do have an obligation on our side to help President Bush pass his violent crime and drug legislation.

So let me just suggest that next week we will probably reraise the question. In the interim the gentleman's leadership might want to talk with Chairman BROOKS and others to see if we might begin to look at some dates. We would like to do it in a bipartisan way. We think that would be the better way to do it. The gentleman is right, in past years we have succeeded that way. I would just hope that maybe next week the gentleman could tell us when we could bring that kind of a bill up.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, let me say to the gentleman that we will certainly try to be in that position.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Maryland, and I yield back the balance of my time.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule be dispensed with on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MAZZOLI). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT FROM THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1990, TO MONDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1990

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Thursday, February 22, 1990, it adjourn to meet at noon on Monday, February 26, 1990.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING ON WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1990

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Tuesday, February 27, 1990, it adjourn to meet at noon on Wednesday, February 28, 1990.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL QUARTER HORSE WEEK

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 186) designating the week of March 1 through March 7, 1990, as "National Quarter Horse Week," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I take this time simply to identify the chief sponsor of this joint resolution, our colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SARPALIUS].

Mr. Speaker, having made that identification and thanking the gentleman for getting the requisite number of cosponsors, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. SARPALIUS. Mr. Speaker, Senate Joint Resolution 186 and House Joint Resolution 345 designating the week of March 1 through March 7, 1990 as "National Quarter Horse Week" passed the House last week, and I want to personally thank the Members who cosigned this joint resolution.

The American Quarter Horse Association was founded on March 15, 1940 to record and preserve the pedigrees of the American quarter horses and continued to serve such purposes. This association has developed into the largest equine registry in the world, with 200,000 individuals and 2,800,000 American quarter horses registered in the United States and 62 foreign countries.

In the late 1940's the national headquarters office was moved from Fort Worth, TX, to Amarillo, TX. Having outgrown its facilities, in 1983 the headquarters was moved to its present beautiful, modern building on I–40. We are very proud that this association has chosen to call Amarillo home and invite you to stop by to visit its headquarters whenever you may be in our area. Next year the association will open the American Quarter Horse Heritage Center and Museum in Amarillo to showcase the horse's historical role and house the group's hall of fame.

The support of the American Quarter Horse Association board of directors from across the Nation was invaluable in passing this resolution. I know many of you received personal calls or letters from those members in your States. Our special thanks to each of them for their assistance. Again, I want to thank you for your interest and support of this valuble industry.

As members of this association meet in Fort Worth, TX, this week for their annual meeting and to celebrate 50 successful years, I send my heartiest congratulations and best wishes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution as follows:

S.J. Res. 186

Whereas the American Quarter Horse Association was founded on March 15, 1940, to record and preserve the pedigrees of American quarter horses, and continues to serve such purposes;

Whereas the American quarter horse has played a significant role in the development of the United States and contributed to the western heritage of the Nation;

Whereas the American Quarter Horse Association has developed into the largest equine registry in the world, with more than two million eight hundred thousand American quarter horses and two hundred thousand individuals located in the United States and sixty-two foreign countries;

Whereas the American quarter horse industry has become invaluable to the agriculture industry of the Nation, and American quarter horses are enjoyed by more individuals than any other breed of horse in the world; and

Whereas the American Quarter Horse Association celebrates its fiftieth anniversary in March 1990; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of March 1 through March 7, 1990, is designated as "National Quarter Horse Week", and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the Senate joint resolution just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

ISRAEL ACCUSES PLO OF CONTINUING TERRORISM

(Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend remarks.)

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, it is a critical time in the ongoing search for a lasting peace in the Middle East. An article in today's Washington Post, "Israel Accuses PLO of Continuing Terrorism," states that the United States has agreed that there is evidence that Arafat's group itself is responsible for the latest terrorist raid which is a clear violation of U.S. conditions to sustain the dialog.

It was over a year ago that the United States is said to have begun substantive dialog with the PLO because Arafat articulated certain formulations demanded by the United States for 13 years. Despite the dialog, terrorists acts undertaken by the PLO and its member groups continue to pose obstacles to the peace process.

The clock is ticking. We anxiously await the report of State Department's report of the PLO Commitments Compliance Act of 1989. The threats to Israel's sovereignty are not deferred by our bureaucratic deadlines.

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 21, 1990]

ISRAEL ACCUSES PLO OF CONTINUING TERRORISM

ACTS SEEN VIOLATING 1988 PLEDGE BY ARAFAT

(By Jackson Diehl)

Jerusalem, Feb. 20—As efforts to arrange Israeli-Palestinian negotiations reach a crucial phase, the United States and Israel are at odds over what the government here says have been clear violations by the Palestine Liberation Organization of its 1988 pledge to give up terrorism.

Despite repeated protests by Israel, the United States has conducted a dialogue with the PLO over the last 14 months and tacitly conceded the organization an indirect role in the current Middle East peace process. In theory, Washington has strictly conditioned the connection on adherence by the PLO to Chairman Yasser Arafat's November 1988 declaration recognizing Israel and renouncing acts of terror against civilian targets.

Israeli officials, however, have been arguing to the Bush administration with increasing vehemence that PLO attacks against Israel have not ceased. Since the beginning of 1989, security officials here say, there have been at least six attempts to penetrate Israel's northern border by guerrillas associated with the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine, a leftist faction within the PLO. The most recent was late last month by a group apparently aiming to attack a kibbutz in northern Israel.

Moreover, senior Israeli officials say they have presented the United States with evidence that Arafat's own Fatah movement launched a raid from Egypt into Israel's Negev desert on Dec. 5. A heavily armed group of five guerrillas crossed the border that night, but were killed by Israeli army troops before they could carry out any attacks.

Defense Minister Yitzhak Rabin told a closed session of Israel's parliament recently that "there is no argument between our military and [U.S.] military about the facts" of the alleged Fatah raid. The United States, he said, agreed that the evidence showed Arafat's group was responsible.

Sources here said that the Bush administration had raised the Negev raid with the PLO leadership in Tunis, and that U.S. officials believed the attack had occurred without Arafat's knowledge or authorization. U.S. officials, the sources added, maintain that Israel has not offered Washington any conclusive evidence connecting Fatah to the attack.

Nevertheless, Israeli officials argue that the United States is ignoring its own policy by keeping the incident quiet and by failing to insist that the PLO denounce the attacks and expel members responsible for them.

According to the "talking points" conveyed by the United States to the PLO at their first official meeting in Tunis in December 1988, no American administration would continue the dialogue if terrorism continued "by the PLO or any of its factions." Moreover, Washington stipulated that in the event of a Palestinian act of terrorism, Tunis would be expected to "not only condemn this action publicly but also discipline those responsible for it."

"Not only has the PLO failed to fulfill these requirements, but Arafat's own Fatah organization, in particular, has itself engaged in terrorist acts," said a report recently prepared by the office of Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir and delivered to U.S. Ambassador William Brown. "It has encouraged and lauded these attacks even in the midst of the dialogue."

The issue has become particularly sensitive in the wake of a terrorist attack this month on a tour bus outside Cairo in which nine Israelis died. Although the PLO is not suspected of involvement in the incident, it failed to condemn it.

Israel is also pressing the United States about the various commando attacks because the PLO's present role as a silent partner in the peace process is a major irritant to Shamir and the leadership of his right-wing Likud Party.

In the latest incident, an Israel army patrol came under attack Jan. 26 near Taibeh in southern Lebanon from at least three fighters from the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine, a pro-Syrian faction of the PLO.

The PLO has frequently said that its abandonment of "terrorism" does not include ending attacks on Israeli military targets such as the patrols in Lebanon, and the United States has tacitly accepted this statement."

Israeli security sources say the group at Taibeh was carrying a map of approaches to the Misgav Am kibbutz in Israel, and wire cutters to penetrate the kibbutz's security fence. Moreover, Israeli reports said, a spokesman of the Democratic Front announced publicly after the attack that the group was headed for Misgav Am.

H.R. 917, SOCIAL SECURITY TRANSITIONAL BENEFIT COMPUTATION ACT OF 1989, REMAINS STIFLED IN COMMITTEE

(Mr. DONALD E. "BUZ" LUKENS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. DONALD E. "BUZ" LUKENS. Mr. Speaker, the social security notch inequity has gone on long enough. It is time for us in Congress to send a message to these seniors, who number approximately 7 million, that we do care and this injustice will no longer be ignored. Seniors in my district express strong concern that we here in Washington are neglecting their situation in the hopes that it will soon go away. These seniors are frightened because this is a matter of survival for them. Colleagues, we can not let this legislation die.

Currently, H.R. 917, or the Social Security Transitional Benefit Computation Act of 1989, has 144 cosponsors but remains stifled in committee.

In September of last year, notch advocates initiated a petition to release this bill; 218 signatures are required. I call on my colleagues to join me in bringing this important piece of legislation to the floor for debate.

At this point I submit for the RECORD letters from two of my constituents expressing their concern.

NEIL W. MCCARTHY & ASSOCIATES,
Cleveland, OH, January 24, 1990.

Congressman DONALD LUKENS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LUKENS: Both my wife and I are what is referred to as "Notch Babies": I was born in 1917 and my wife in 1918. We are not asking for anything that we do not deserve, but we would like to have our share the same as all other senior citizens that are drawing Social Security.

I would love to have the existing House of Representatives and the Senate undo the law that was passed when Mr. Carter was President that discriminated against people that were born between 1917 and 1923. Martha McSteen has informed us that Bills S121/H.R. 2707 would correct this error. Would you please vote to correct this ruling?

Sincerely,

NEIL W. MCCARTHY, Sr.

HAMILTON, OH,
February 6, 1990.

Representative DONALD E. LUKENS,

HONORABLE SIR: As a member of the 8th district, I am writing you in regard to a grave injustice created by Congress. It is in regard to the Social Security System. Whose idea was it to penalize those people who were born during the years of 1917-1920? Why were they singled out to be the ones to be the scapegoats?

I keep reading about the tremendous surplus being built up in the account. Even in this morning's Enquirer, it was stated that they were taking in a billion dollars a week, more than they were paying out. I feel this is something that should be rectified. The sooner, the better.

Maybe they are waiting for all in this age group to die off, then, they won't have to settle.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM C. ROSE.

HAMILTON, OH,
February 1, 1990.

Re Sanford/Hefner bill (S. 1212/H.R. 2707).

To Senator John Glenn, Senator Howard M. Metzenbaum, Congressman Donald E. Lukens:

GENTLEMEN: We ask that you support the referenced legislation so that the travesty of unfair social security payments to those citizens of the United States who were born between 1917 and 1926 (known as the "Notch Years), be changed to fair payments the same as those received by all other social security recipients.

The citizens of this country should all receive payments for social security based on the same rates. The persons who were born during the years 1917 through 1926 should be paid monthly checks in the same amounts as those received by citizens born in all other years. The uneven amounts have caused the "Notch Year Citizens" to be paid less under social security and this inequity should be changed. We request your support of the Sanford/Hefner solution to this inequity.

Sincerely,

Mr. and Mrs. JAMES BATDORF.

VIEWS ON PROPOSED STATEHOOD FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCEWEN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like just to take a moment to discuss something that has become increasingly popular of late, and that is this idea that somehow or other the District of Columbia should be made a state.

This morning, as I mentioned in my 1-minute, I endured what many of us here endured when our committee meetings had to be postponed because of the traffic situation. I remember some months ago, I was shaving at about 6 in the morning and the television announced that the traffic was backed up for over 20 miles. They had the little red lights flashing on the interstate because the traffic was absolutely stopped because of supposedly an abandoned car on the 14th Street Bridge.

That was at 6 in the morning. I left 45 minutes early. I tried to make accommodations for it. All of us were late, getting in here at 10 or 11 in the morning. Come to find out over 3½ hours passed before the District of Columbia had the capacity to move a car out of the highway.

Again this morning the same sort of thing happened. Traffic was backed up over 20 miles, only because the District of Columbia does not have the capacity to seem to run traffic directions.

I know all the rest of the things the District cannot do; everyone does. I remember how beautiful this city was before we started on this home rule idea. And so now in order for any part of the city to be safe or secure, we have the Department of the Interior and Parks run the mall, and we have the Capitol police direct traffic around the Capitol here, and we have security forces for the White House, but the part that is not under the control of the Federal Government has deteriorated tremendously, much to the embarrassment of all of us who are Americans.

Then we see what happens, with the highest death rate of any place in the world. Something like 3 times as many as on the West Bank of Israel were killed right here in the city of Washington, DC.

This continual embarrassment needs to be answered, not by more government in the District of Columbia but by perhaps returning to the kind of control that made this the beautiful capital of the world that it was prior to the 1970's.

Mr. Speaker, this idea that somehow or other the District of Columbia should have a house of representatives and a state senate and a governor and a lieutenant governor and a state auditor and a secretary of state and an attorney general and all the other state government, with a state capitol—and I am sure they have no intention of doing away with their city council—is just something that someone should begin to speak out about immediately before it is given a certain amount of credibility. Everyone kind of snickers at the idea, but no one thus far in recent weeks has begun to point out the destruction in this city that has taken place since it established home rule.

If the District of Columbia wants to have two senators, then let it go back to Maryland where it came from. As the northern part of Virginia went back to Virginia, let that part of the District of Columbia go back to Maryland, if that is their desire.

Do something that makes it so that when people come to visit here, they do not have to go through the embarrassment to our Nation that somehow or another this is representative of our country.

Mr. Speaker, I remember a hometown friend that came to Washington for the first time. They were coming up here for a dinner at about 6:30 in the evening. He and his wife checked into the Washington Hilton at about 4 o'clock. They have a couple of hours. They hired a cab and drove around. During the 2 hours that they were riding in the cab they saw two dead bodies that were surrounded by police and cordoned off, people that had been murdered on the streets of Washington, DC.

Enough already. I mean those of us who love America, those of us that are involved in government, those of us who deal with township trustees, and city councils, and police chiefs in our districts on a daily basis, who know what competent local government is like, who know what the ability to lead cities is all about know that this city is not being run properly or fairly, and the last thing we ought to do is to add a whole layer of State government on top of it.

Mr. Speaker, I just think that it is high time that somebody begins to speak out about an idea that would go in the right direction, and the best thing that we could do would be to return to the kind of leadership that we had prior to this home rule disaster.

MOST-FAVORED-NATION STATUS FOR ROMANIA, BULGARIA, EAST GERMANY, AND CZECHOSLOVAKIA

(Mrs. KENNELLY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, yesterday President Bush greeted President Havel of Czechoslovakia. And today the joint Houses of Congress warmly received him.

There can be no doubt that President Havel is a courageous man. And there can be no doubt that the United States ought to help Czechoslovakia in every way possible.

In fact, President Bush yesterday, after meeting with Mr. Havel, announced that he will grant most-favored-nation status to Czechoslovakia. And I commend him for this.

But, Mr. Speaker we can and should also do this for the other Eastern European nations who have shown the same courage and advancements.

Early this year, I introduced legislation to grant most-favored-nation status to Romania, Bulgaria, East Germany, and Czechoslovakia. Each and every one of these four nations has earned this.

I'm delighted that President Bush has granted this status to Czechoslovakia, but I urge him not to turn his back on her neighboring nations.

GUN SAFETY LEGISLATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, as many Members are aware, because I have spoken of it proudly many times, I have seven grandchildren, and I am happy to say for the first time that an eighth is on the way, God willing, this coming August.

Mr. Speaker, I take the safety of my grandchildren to heart. It is one of the reasons I work so hard on the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control and worry about all of the modern problems affecting this beautiful, wonderful land of ours.

Mr. Speaker, I am lucky enough, being a bicoastal Congressman, to have three of my grandchildren living in Springfield, VA, just a short ways from here, and the other four are out in California.

The oldest of my grandchildren, Ricky, is in the third grade, and the other day a young classmate of his brought a loaded .44 Magnum pistol to school.

Now I am a conservative Republican. Over the years I have supported many National Rifle Association positions. I have considered them a responsible organization. I have not always agreed with them on every approach to every issue, but there is one thing I think we stand together on, and that is gun safety.

With all the talk of gun control, gun banning, gun confiscation, the one thing that we should all get together on is the teaching of gun safety. There are bills that have bipartisan support in many of our great States, and there are bills now before the legislatures of the great Commonwealths of Massachusetts and Virginia at this very moment. I believe the NRA is supportive of this approach to gun safety training for children.

My daughter was properly upset and frightened at the thought of a sixth grader coming to school with a loaded .44 Magnum. She was well aware of a recent event in my district in the shopping mall across from my Federal office a few days before Christmas. A sixth grader brought a loaded gun with hardly the firepower of a .44 Magnum, a plain old .38 special, but in that mall a few days before Christmas when some classmates teased him that it was not real or that it would not work, he pulled the trigger. This little boy killed a little girl standing near him there on the spot, ran away for 3 days and finally turned up. His father, courageously, went on television and said that it was not his son's fault, that his son was a good boy, that it was his fault, as the father, for not exercising good gun safety.

Mr. Speaker, my daughter and three of her friends, all third grade mothers, Cathy Continetti, Jennie Marc Antonio, Holly Luken, and my daughter, Theresa Cobban, and I'd like to think a chip off the old block, got together, asked the school if they could have some gun safety education and, maybe, join the statewide Virginia PTA and endorse one of these gun safety training bills down in Richmond. The school authorities, I am sorry to say, were more interested in covering up what could have been a potential disaster, wanting to turn the other way and have business as usual. And the local PTA, I am sorry to say, was not all that supportive.

Mr. Speaker, an estimated 135,000 boys carried handguns to school daily in 1987, and another 270,000 carried handguns to school at least once. I hate to think how many carried guns in 1989 and continue to carry them in 1990. The National School Safety Center estimates that nearly 8.7 million youngsters have access to handguns. It is imperative that children learn that firearms are not toys. Gun safety is important.

So, these four young third grade mothers, homemakers, they took the bull by the horns, so to speak, and called a meeting of their fellow parents. After much resistance and much pushing on the part of Terry, Cathy, Jennie, and particularly Holly, who chaired the meeting, these young activists managed to get unanimous votes less than 48 hours ago. These concerned parents voted to endorse the legislation that the State PTA thinks is fitting on gun safety, but also to push for approval of any further legislation that is bipartisan in nature.

These young women educated themselves fast on all the aspects of gun safety, tried very hard to approach it in a bipartisan respect for the second amendment way, and with their articulation and their steadfastness of spirit they have accomplished much in this one little elementary school, Sangster School, just outside our infamous Washington Beltway. I think they have shown the excellent approach of self-government. This type of involvement is everything that this poetic and wonderful President of Czechoslovakia, Mr. Vaclav Havel, spoke to us about this morning, people getting control of their own lives. His quote of our great Thomas Jefferson, whose bust is above us over your shoulder, Mr. Speaker, is in the end what government is all about, people taking control of their own lives.

So, Mr. Speaker, I salute my daughter Terri and her three friends who have joined us in this Chamber today and tell them Godspeed, and good luck, and I hope this important legislation passes in Richmond.

THE CRISIS IN HAITI

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. OWENS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I first rise to applaud my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. DYMALLY] for offering a resolution yesterday which called for a condemnation of the continuing escalation of the violations of human rights in Haiti. Haiti has had a blood bath for 2 years since the time when a scheduled election which was set by a duly constituted constitutional committee was thrown into chaos by the ruling junta at that time. Since that time it has experienced several governments and now it is under the rule of Gen. Prosper Avril, who was once an intimate advisor for Duvalier, Papa Duvalier, and the Duvalier that came after him; so the long continuity of Haitian dictatorship and Haitian tyranny is continued now by the man who was once the advisor to the two great dictators before.

I applaud the resolution of the gentleman from California [Mr. DYMALLY] because it means that the Congress has at least taken some initiative, since the administration will not. This administration has been soft on dictatorship and tyranny in Haiti since Duvalier was thrown out. This administration is partially the cause for the tyranny and continuation of the violation of human rights in Haiti. This administration has not spoken with any indignation about the conditions in Haiti in the past few months or in the past 2 years.

The fact that the administration takes such a soft approach is one reason that the tyranny and the blood baths continue.

We not only demand free elections in Nicaragua, but we are financing the opposition in Nicaragua, which you know, I have no objection to, the use of American taxpayer dollars for that purpose. Let the opposition have some kind of support; however, in Haiti we cannot even raise our voices very loudly against the tyranny there and demand free elections. Not only should we have free elections in Haiti, but we should also finance an opposition.

We should at this point say to the dictatorial tyrannical government of Prosper Avril that we have had enough and that we are actually going to help set up a government in exile and actually offer to finance the four or five clear opposition parties that have refused to have anything to do with the elections that are now scheduled by Mr. Avril. Mr. Avril says that he will have elections. He has written a new set of rules. He did all this after he threw out his major opposition. He threw them out of the country. He arrested them. He beat them up, and he gave them an alternative, leave or risk further harm. They felt the country. He wrote a new set of guidelines for the election. Now he is inviting them to come back, or he has invited other people to participate in the election under a new set of rules written by Mr. Avril himself. This is all quite ridiculous. It has gone on for much too long. Not only is Haiti violating human rights and should be condemned by our Government, since our Government stands for human rights all over the world, but we had an address today by the President of Czechoslovakia and we applauded the fact that not only Czechoslovakia, but many of the other governments of Eastern Europe are moving toward democracy. We applaud that. I applaud that.

I believe in democracy, and I do not know why our administration should be so hyprocritical that it cannot insist that we have democracy in Haiti. Haiti is just 90 miles from the shores of Florida. The people of Haiti have suffered for a long time. The people of Haiti know that the Government of Haiti, the few people in charge, will obey the will of the United States. They have no other support except the money that if funneled into Haiti from the United States.

Our State Department, the present administration, has a great deal of influence. They merely have to exercise it. The timid statements of condemnation that we have heard is not an exercise of the influence of the United States in an appropriate manner. If we demand that the Government of Haiti hold free elections and hold them in accordance with the Constitution that was duly established by the people of Haiti, if we demand that, they will do it. We have never demanded that. We have never been satisfied that the opposition parties were to our liking. Our State Department has played a game with each successive dictator since Duvalier.

Mr. Speaker, it is time the hypocrisy stopped. We are also still turning back ships or boats which bring Haitian people out of Haiti as a result of the tremendous persecution in Haiti. We say that they are not persecuted politically, they are only coming to this country in order to enjoy the economic benefits of this country. That is ridiculous. When you look at the record of intimidation, a record of blood letting in Haiti, it is clear that Haitian citizens coming to this country are coming because they are politically persecuted.

Let us end the hypocrisy. Let us demand democracy in Haiti now.

TRIBUTE TO POLICE OFFICER TERRY KUNKE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to share with my colleagues in the House of Representatives an inspirational example of great courage demonstrated by Chicago police officer Therese Kunke, who has been fighting a battle against cancer for the past 7 months.

Officer Kunke joined the police force on July 19, 1982, and has served with distinction for the past 8 years as an officer working out of the 16th district of the Chicago Police Department, located in the 11th Congressional District of Illinois which I am honored to represent.

The 16th district of the Chicago Police Department will be holding a benefit party honoring Officer Kunke on Sunday, March 5, 1990 at the Copernicus Foundation, 5216 West Lawrence Avenue in Chicago.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Comdr. Nestor W. Chakonas of the 16th District, and all of the officers in the Police Department of the City of Chicago who have worked tirelessly on Officer Kunke's behalf. The names of the dedicated committee members follow:

Officer Therese Kunke is a second generation officer in the Chicago Police Department, following in the tradition of her father, who served on the police force for 30 years. When her father retired from the force, Officer Kunke received his star. Commander Chakonas paid her the ultimate tribute when he said recently that Terry has been " * * * an excellent police officer and a credit to the Department."

Officer Kunke was born Therese Du Bray on December 4, 1949 in Chicago, IL. She attended St. Catherine of Siena grammar school in Oak Park, IL and Siena High School in Chicago. Terry graduated from De Paul University in 1972 after majoring in physical education. She was a substitute teacher in Chicago and taught third grade for 1 year at St. Thomas Aquinas School.

Terry has two daughters, Jennifer and Lisa, and has also been an active volunteer in our community, working with St. Mary of Providence School for Handicapped Children, and with St. Priscilla's Church.

I share the pride of Terry's friends and neighbors in all of her accomplishments, and in her honor, I have arranged with the Architect of the Capitol of the United States to have a flag flown over the Capitol Building. This flag will be presented to her on March 4 at the benefit party being organized for her by her fellow police officers.

Mr. Speaker, I join with Officer Kunke's friends, neighbors, and fellow officers in recognizing her great service to our community and the inspiration she has provided to all whose lives she has touched. Our hopes and prayers are always with her.

THE MEDICARE BUY-IN EXTENSION ACT OF 1990

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. STARK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce the Medicare Buy-in Extension Act of 1990. This bill would expand Medicaid buy-in protection to elderly beneficiaries with incomes up to 133 percent of the Federal poverty level.

According to a report issued by the Commonwealth Fund Commission on Elderly People Living Alone, "Medicare's Poor," one-third of near-poor elderly people are reduced to poverty by their out-of-pocket payments for medical care.

These people need our help. It is outrageous that we spend nearly $5 billion on star wars while forcing near-poor seniors to choose between essential medical services and heat. This choice forces too many seniors into financial disaster.

Today, out-of-pocket medical costs remain a serious concern for millions of older Americans. Approximately 3 million near-poor elderly persons have incomes that barely exceed the Federal poverty level, yet only 8 percent have Medicaid supplementary assistance. Consequently, near-poor seniors, with annual incomes of less than $7,200 per year—less than $140 per week—incur substantial out-of-pocket costs for their medical expenses.

When compared to senior citizens in higher income groups, these near-poor seniors are particularly vulnerable. They tend to be the oldest of the old, in poorer health, have more chronic conditions and functional impairments, use more prescription drugs and are more likely to incur substantial medical expenses. According to the 1987 National Medical Expenditures Survey [NMES], seniors who are near poor spend 15 percent more than the average Medicare beneficiary for prescription drugs.

In 1988, Congress enacted legislation requiring States to phase in buy-in coverage for low-income Medicare beneficiaries with incomes at or below 100 percent of the Federal poverty level. Under this provision, States are required to pay Medicare premiums, deductibles, and coinsurance for eligible elderly and disabled enrollees. This provision was designed to eliminate financial barriers to access.

Under current law, States are required to extend coverage to individuals living in families with incomes up to 85 percent of poverty in 1989, 90 percent of poverty in 1990, 95 percent of poverty in 1991, and up to 100 percent of poverty in 1992. The proposed bill would extend coverage to seniors living in families with incomes up to 133 percent of the Federal poverty level.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is similar to a provision included in the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990 [OBRA 89] that required all States to cover pregnant women and infants with family incomes of up to 133 percent of the Federal poverty level by April 1, 1990. Similarly, the Medicare Buy-in Extension Act of 1990 would require States to cover senior citizens with incomes of up to 133 percent of the Federal poverty level.

With the 1990 Medicare deductible at $592, Medicare premiums at $28.60 per month, copayments for physician bills rising with the 12-percent growth in physician expenditures, the average near-poor Medicare beneficiary can expect to spend a significant share of annual income for medical care.

In 1988, the most recent year from which data are available, the average near poor beneficiary spent more than $800 per year for Medicare copayments. Expenses for Medicare copayments represent 11 percent of income for individuals living at 133 percent of the Federal poverty level.

What's worse, more than one-half of low-income seniors struggle to buy Medicare supplemental policies—shown as Medigap—to protect themselves against medical bills. Moreover, according to the Congressional Budget Office, low-income seniors are less likely than higher income seniors to have employer provided Medicare supplemental policies.

Between 1989 and 1990, Medigap premiums increased an average by 25 percent. In 1989, a basic policy was priced at about $720 per year. Policies that cover additional benefits, such as prescription drugs, can cost more than $1,100 per year. For low-income beneficiaries, these costs present prohibitive financial barriers to basic medical protection.

The Medicare Buy-in Extension Act of 1990 would offer enormous assistance to the 3 million near-poor Medicare beneficiaries who struggle to pay their medical bills. I urge my colleagues to join me in an effort to assist these low-income senior citizens.

SENATE—Wednesday, February 21, 1990

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 23, 1990)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable RICHARD H. BRYAN, a Senator from the State of Nevada.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

From whence come wars and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members? Ye lust, and have not: ye kill, and desire to have, and cannot obtain: ye fight and war, yet ye have not, because ye ask not.—James 4:1, 2.

Eternal God, this penetrating diagnosis by St. James makes us want to defend ourselves and say, "Not Guilty," But the hardest accusation is the simplest: "* * * ye have not, because ye ask not." In spite of all the Biblical encouragement to pray, examples of great men and women of the Bible, our own inclination to pray when life tumbles in, we fail to take prayer seriously, we do anything rather than pray.

In the words of Charles Dickens, "These are the best of times and the worst of times." Never has America had a greater opportunity. No more cold war. Demand for freedom exploding all over the world. Collapse of oppressive governments. Yet we face an overwhelming problem of drugs, debt, disintegrating moral environment, our own Capital City in trouble. We remember the greatness of America following World War II, retooling to rebuild a world destroyed by war.

Help us, Lord, not to fail at this propitious time in history. Save us from majoring in minors. In Jesus' name. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of proceedings be approved to date.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the time between now and 10:40 will be divided between the two leaders. At 10:40, the Senate will recess until 12:15 today so Members of the Senate may attend a joint meeting with the House to hear an address by President Havel of Czechoslovakia.

When the Senate reconvenes at 12:15, there will be a period for morning business until 1:15, with Senators permitted to speak therein.

When morning business closes at 1:15, the Senate will resume debate on the motion to proceed to Senate Joint Resolution 212, the Armenia resolution. It is expected that debate on the motion will continue throughout today's session.

Mr. President, I have a statement to make regarding the State Department human rights report on China.

I ask unanimous consent that if my remarks extend beyond one-half of the allotted time, that the leader time of the distinguished Republican leader, which I will reserve following my remarks, be extended to an equal time.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that will be the order.

STATE DEPARTMENT HUMAN RIGHTS REPORT ON CHINA

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I begin my remarks today with a quotation. It reads as follows:

The human rights climate in China deteriorated dramatically in 1989. On March 5-7, People's Armed Police (PAP) used indiscriminate and excessive force in suppressing demonstrations in Lhasa, Tibet, killing scores of persons. These killings and other serious human rights abuses, however, were dwarfed when the leadership ordered the People's Liberation Army (PLA) and other security forces to suppress forcefully a peaceful, student-led movement seeking greater freedom for China's people. At least several hundred, and possibly thousands, of people were killed in Beijing on June 3-4. The Beijing massacre was followed by a drastic, country-wide crackdown on participants, supporters, and sympathizers. Thousands were arrested and about a score are known to have been executed, following trials which fell far short of international standards, for alleged crimes committed during the unrest. There have also been persistent but unconfirmed reports of numerous unannounced executions. At year's end, the crackdown was still continuing.

Those powerful words are not mine. They are not the words of a critic of President Bush or of his administration. They are the words of the United States Department of State in its report on human rights in China.

That report is a devastating indictment of the human rights position of the Chinese Government. It is an equally devastating indictment of the policies of the Bush administration toward China.

The State Department report makes it clear that the Government of China is pursuing a policy that violates the rights of its citizens broadly, indiscriminately, and in a way that should shock the conscience of the world.

It does shock the conscience of Americans. Unfortunately, it has not shocked the conscience of the executive Branch of the American Government. As we know, last December, ironically on International Human Rights Day, two high ranking officials of our Government met in Beijing with the very Chinese leaders who ordered the Tiananmen Square massacre.

Now it is clear that those same leaders have subsequently implemented a crackdown on political dissent which has subjected Chinese citizens to imprisonment, to physical beatings and torture, to personal humiliation and degradation, and some to execution.

Last year, I said it was wrong for the administration to support human rights in its words but not in its deeds. I called on the President not to conduct business as usual with China and thereby make a mockery of our profession of concern for human rights and our own ideals. I urged instead that the President affirmatively and publicly press the Government of China to grant its citizens the democratic self-determination that is the right of all men and women.

Now the Department of State's own report on human rights in China prompts me to reiterate that call. Surely, at the beginning of a decade that is seeing the collapse of another totalitarian system in Eastern Europe and within the Soviet Union, there is no longer any credibility to the claim of a government that it has any moral right to attack its own people.

The State Department report says that, "Virtually all internationally recognized human rights discussed in this report are restricted, many of them severely."

Those "internationally recognized human rights" include the fundamental human right to be free from:

Political and other extrajudicial killing;

Torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment;

Arbitrary arrest, detention or exile;

Denial of fair public trial;

Arbitrary interference with privacy, family, home or correspondence; and Excessive force and violations of humanitarian law in internal conflicts.

These are basic human rights so self-evident to Americans that their mere listing alone is chilling.

Most Americans already assume that no government has the right to torture its citizens; that no government has the right to fire on unarmed, peacefully assembled civilians; that no government has the right to execute people just because they want political change.

Yet, as the State Department report makes clear, these are today the routine actions of the Chinese Government. The State Department reports that: "The Government maintains control through a nationwide security network * * * In 1989, the security network was responsible for widespread human rights abuses, especially in Beijing and Xizang (Tibet)."

There is and can be no doubt that the abuses of its people are the intentional work of the Chinese Government.

The State Department points out, as well, that "The government, as a matter of course, does not publicly announce the names of those detained or arrested."

In connection with the persistent reports of executions, the State Department reports that "Chinese officials have refused to respond to diplomatic requests for information."

The "persistent and consistent" reports of torture, as the State Department characterizes them, cannot be confirmed or, of course, conclusively disproven, because the Chinese Government refuses to acknowledge that it is accountable to anyone for its treatment of its own people.

Yet the two secret visits to that same government by high-ranking American officials last year were excused by the administration on the grounds that we should not isolate China, and that such contacts will help improve the climate for human rights.

The State Department report offers no evidence of any improvement in the human rights climate at all.

Throughout the 20th century, the world has heard the repeated claims of dictators that their treatment of their own people is not the business of others.

The world has also heard the repeated claims that "quiet diplomacy" is the only way to proceed in such cases.

History has now shown the bankruptcy of both of these claims.

Neither the collapse of Eastern European communism nor the freeing of Nelson Mandela came about because of quiet diplomacy or silence by the outside world. Both events were hastened and in some respects precipitated by precisely the opposite—outside scrutiny and vocal, sustained, insistent public calls for improvement, especially public calls by America.

When Nelson Mandela walks into the White House, both he and President Bush should reflect on the fact that Mr. Mandela is out of prison in part because the United States Congress imposed sanctions on South Africa over the objections of then President Reagan and Vice President Bush.

If the Reagan-Bush administration had had its way, there would have been no sanctions imposed on South Africa and Nelson Mandela might still be in prison.

Have we learned from that experience? If so, what policy should we now follow with respect to China?

I say we must recognize that the Chinese people, one quarter of the human race, are subject to repression that requires—indeed that demands—vocal, sustained, insistent public calls for improvement.

But to the contrary, our Government's policy toward China has demonstrated a lack of concern about the shocking events depicted so graphically in the State Department's report.

The Chinese Government has ordered the murder of its own citizens; it has practiced indiscriminate detention and arrest; it permits torture and degradation in government custody; it carries out judicial murders in the form of executions.

To this day, the Chinese Government's policy is one of repression against every vestige of free expression inside the country, coupled with censorship and the Big Lie technique of denial to the outside world.

In response, the Bush administration authorized not just one, but two secret, high-level missions to the Chinese Government, the first barely a month after the blood ran on Tiananmen Square, the second in December.

Instead of signing the bill to protect Chinese students here against forced repatriation, the President vetoed it and fought hard and successfully to have his veto sustained.

Instead of maintaining economic sanctions against China, the President lifted the two most visible—giving export licenses for three satellites, and letting our Export-Import Bank extend loans and guarantees for United States exports to China. Those gestures followed the lifting of sanctions to let the sales of several airliners to China go through.

And although licenses for four arms sales have not yet been issued, the contractors have been allowed to keep working on those projects—a strong indication that these exports, too, will soon be permitted.

The human rights record of the Chinese Government is not limited to brutality and crude repression. It goes also to the civil rights of its people, as the State Department makes clear. Freedom of speech and press have been severely restricted both for Chinese citizens and foreign journalists.

Excerpts from the report tell the story: "In the aftermath, authorities severely restricted the movements of foreign journalists * * *"; "Restrictions on the publication of books * * * became much more stringent since June."; "* * * tighter control on distribution has enabled authorities to censor foreign language material more effectively."

The Chinese Government is willing to sacrifice the future of its youth, the hope of any nation, to the overriding desire to retain power. Thus, the State Department reports:

> The Government has worked to reimpose more rigid ideological control over the school system. The State Education Commission ordered that 30,000 fewer first-year students be admitted to universities for the fall 1989 semester. * * * The entire first-year class at Beijing University * * * was sent to an isolated camp for a year of military training and ideological indoctrination. (The Government said this program might be expanded to include additional universities in the future.)

What possible justification can there be for a government to limit the future of its own country by restricting the education of its own most promising people? There can be none other than the lust for power.

In virtually every element of civil rights, the Chinese government has taken action to secure its own survival against the rights of the Chinese People. Individual identity cards are being issued and checked to control travel within the country, the human rights monitoring group has been disbanded, the right of Chinese to associate is limited to groups that the government agrees to register, independent trade unions of Chinese working people are outlawed.

Indeed, it is the ultimate tragic irony that in a self-styled People's Republic, allegedly devoted to the interests of workers, "* * * workers became a primary target of government reprisals. * * * All of those known to have been executed for offenses linked to the demonstrations were manual workers."

The State Department report speaks in broad terms, as it must. Other, individual voices say the same things. Prof. Yang Ye, of Bates College, in Maine, recently spoke to me and sent me a letter. Professor Ye wrote:

There has been no improvement whatsoever in terms of the human rights situation in the People's Republic of China. With three hundred thousand troops around and enforced security forces within the city, the lifting of martial law in Beijing is a big joke aimed only at fooling foreign media and luring foreign investment.

Professor Ye reminds us that the "most recent response to the olive branch offered to the Beijing regime by President Bush was that 9 Chinese Catholic ministers and 30 priests in Hebei province were arrested in late December, among whom 8 are at this moment still in prison."

Chillingly, Professor Ye says that despite the claims of the administration that its veto of the visa extension bill will have no effect on Chinese students now is this country,

[a]t least two Chinese students * * * that I know * * * were recently denied extension of their passport by the Chinese consulates in the United States, presumably because of their activities in support of the democracy movement in China.

These students and others in their position must wonder at the depth of American commitment to human rights, so long as our Government speaks in one way but acts in another.

It is not enough for the President's press secretary to say, as he recently did, that "human rights are universal and our duty to comment on them is great." We have an obligation to do more than comment. We have an obligation to behave in accordance with our words as well as merely to say the words.

But the administration's deeds are contrary to its words. As with so many other issues, on human rights in China the administration's words are right, its deeds wrong.

Professor Ye put it clearly and eloquently in his letter to me. I ask my colleagues to listen to these words:

I have long since come to the conclusion that it is our affinities, our points of contacts with all other human beings, not our differences, that should be emphasized to make our world a better and more peaceful place.

We Chinese are not extraterrestrial beings. We live on the same Earth. We have the kind of joy, anger, sorrow, fear, love, hatred and desire, and we should be treated as equals in terms of human rights. * * *

It is simply not right to claim, as some China card players in this country do, that the Chinese have a special "Oriental mind," and that democracy and freedom are something not in Chinese culture. To me, such remarks are insulting and racist, morally unforgivable.

The fundamental concepts of democracy and freedom are not incongruent with the Confucian values of benevolence, humaneness, and individual dignity.

What is alien to Chinese civilization, in my opinion, is the Marxist-Leninist theory of class struggle and violence, a theory that is preoccupied with differences and based on hatred.

I know little about Professor Ye. I have only spoken with him once. But I am moved by his words. I believe he is right. What lies at the heart of human rights concerns is the knowledge that we are all people of the Earth, that our similarities are more important than our differences, and that we are all alike in wanting human freedom and personal liberty—the fundamental acknowledgment of our individual worth.

That is the fundamental claim that every human being has a right to make. It is the claim no government can or should deny, least of all the Government of the United States of America.

Again, I urge the President to be the spokesman for American ideals, for what America stands for and believes in, to speak out in expressing support for the moral issue of human rights for the Chinese people as strongly as he has expressed that support for the people of Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. The Chinese people deserve no less than other human beings.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the comments from Prof. Yang Ye be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BATES COLLEGE,
Lewiston, ME, February 15, 1990.

Hon. GEORGE J. MITCHELL,
U.S. Senator, Senate Russell Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR: Thank you again for seeing me on Monday. I enjoyed every minute of our talk. Let me assure you that my gratefulness to you for what you have done for China and the Chinese people is shared by thousands of Chinese students and scholars in the U.S., many of whom I have encountered and talked to during my tours around the country since last June.

I am, as you can well understand, disappointed at the senate vote last month which failed to override the President's veto of the Pelosi bill. The White House used the tactics of politicizing an issue which, I believe, is beyond and larger than politics. One negative result of the vote is that many of my fellow countrymen in this country are now afraid to speak out for democracy and freedom in China. It is not surprising: having come from a nation where what the dictators say or promise is the law (and we know how much it counts), we had hoped that we could have legislative guarantee of safety in this country to voice what was silenced in China. Of course we now have some promises from the President of the United States, but we find it hard to forget that he also promised, after the Tiananmen massacre, that there would be no high-level contact with the Chinese government, and it was only two weeks after he made that promise that he sent General Scowcroft and Deputy Secretary Eagleburger on their secret mission to Beijing.

Despite the setback I, as well as many of my Chinese friends in the U.S., shall keep fighting for freedom and democracy in China. We owe it to the hundreds of young men and women who were gunned down by machine-guns, whose bodies were rolled over and crushed by tanks in the center of Beijing. We owe it to the thousands of our fellow students and intellectuals at home who were thrown into prison, who were beaten up and tortured there, and those who were already summarily tried and executed in secret. We owe it to the brave young man, the nineteen-year-old Wang Weilin, whose image standing in front of the tanks has become one of the most lasting symbols of 1989, and most probably, of this century. And last but not least, we owe it to the great American people, whose warm and consistent support of our cause has been a constant source of encouragement and inspiration to us.

I must point out that since the President of the United States and his staff worked so hard to defeat the override effort, there has been little, if any, response in return from Deng Xiaoping and the other aging dictators in Beijing. There has been no improvement whatsoever in terms of the human rights situation in the People's Republic of China. With three hundred thousand troops around and enforced security forces within the city, the lifting of martial law in Beijing is a big joke aimed only at fooling foreign media and luring foreign investment. Mr. Fang Lizhi, the astrophysicist and human rights activist, is still taking refuge in the American embassy. Student leaders Wang Dan, Liu Gang, Guo Haifeng, and others who advocated non-violent and peaceful demonstrations, are still languishing in prison with no trial. Not a single list of the arrested and executed has been given by the Chinese regime. A most recent response to the olive branch offered to the Beijing regime by President Bush was that 9 Chinese Catholic ministers and 30 priests in Hebei province were arrested in late December, among whom eight are at this moment still in prison. The Chinese Ministry of Education has recently issued a secret document with further restrictions on study abroad (especially on study in the U.S.) for Chinese college students. At least two Chinese students currently in the U.S. that I know, Mr. Liu Yonghuan and Mr. Xu (pronounced as Hsu) Bangtai (a graduate student at U.C. Berkeley), were recently denied extension of their passport by the Chinese consulates in the U.S., presumably because of their activities in support of the democracy movement in China.

I was born and brought up in a highly tradition-oriented family, and my field is in comparative literature, a discipline that focuses on comparisons and contrasts among different cultures. I have long since come to the conclusion that it is our affinities, our points of contacts with all other human beings, not our differences, that should be emphasized in order to make our world a better and more peaceful place. We Chinese are not extraterrestrial beings (E.T.). We live on the same earth. We have the same kind of joy, anger, sorrow, fear, love, hatred, and desire, and we should be treated as equals in terms of human rights. China is perhaps a land in the "Far East" (a term long since discarded in the academia, and even in the media, because of its Eurocentric flavor, but twice used in the President's State of Union speech), but what is going on in China is not China's "domestic affair" as the Beijing regime claims it to be. One fourth of the world's population is suffering under the repression of a toppling totalitarian regime. It is simply not right to claim, as some China card players in this country do, that the Chinese have a special "Oriental mind," and that democracy and freedom are something not in Chinese culture. To me such remarks are insulting and racist, morally unforgivable. The fundamental concepts of democracy and freedom are not incongruent with the Confucian values of benevolence, humaneness, and individual dignity. What is alien to Chinese civilization, in my opinion, is the Marxist-Leninist theory of class struggle and violence, a theory that is preoccupied with differences and based on hatred.

I appeal to you, dear Senator, and through you, as Senate Majority Leader, to your colleagues, to do whatever within your power to help our country and our countrymen in the struggle for freedom and democracy. If no improvement in the human rights condition is seen in the People's Republic of China in the near future, further sanctions, including the reconsideration of China's status as a Most Favored Nation (MFN), should be placed on the agenda of the legislative branch. If the White House is unwilling to stand for the fundamental values of this great country, it is up to the U.S. Senate and Congress to keep lighting up the beacon for freedom and democracy in the world. If there is anything I can do for this cause please do not hesitate to let me know.

Very sincerely yours,

YANG YE, PH.D.,
Assistant Professor of Chinese,
Bates College.

TRIBUTE TO ELSA SANDSTROM

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, it is my great privilege to honor the memory of a dear friend and a great American, Elsa Sandstrom, a woman who will long be remembered for her intelligence, wit and steadfast devotion to noble causes.

Elsa Sandstrom was a consummate Californian, a personal friend of Ronald Reagan, who through her leadership and foresight became indispensable to the State and national Republican Party. Her courage and conviction were rewarded with the admiration, respect and sheer affection by all those who were fortunate enough to know this truly remarkable woman.

Throughout her long and accomplished life she held many prestigious positions. Whether as State cochairwoman for Ronald Reagan's campaigns for both Governor and President, or as a delegate to the Republican Conventions in which Barry Goldwater, Richard Nixon, Ronald Reagan, and George Bush were nominated, Elsa Sandstrom enjoyed a most successful career and served to enrich each of life's endeavors with an unmitigated dedication to the principles she boldly championed.

I take great pride in honoring the memory of Elsa Sandstrom in this Chamber of the U.S. Senate on behalf of all Californians.

PRESIDENT HAVEL'S ADDRESS TO THE JOINT MEETING OF CONGRESS

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, before we begin the business of the Senate today, in these few moments of calmness, I would like to take the opportunity to reflect for just a few moments on one of the extraordinary pleasures and opportunities of service in the U.S. Senate. Sometimes in our representative capacity we are also here to try to learn and, from that learning, participate in the education process of our country and our countrymen.

This morning I and my colleagues in both the Senate and the House just came from one such learning experience that I would be remiss if I did not commend to other members of the American citizenry who may hear the sound of my voice through our television and radio. As we all know, the proceedings of the Senate now are being televised live throughout the United States.

The President of Czechoslovakia, Mr. Havel, a poet and a playwright, addressed a joint session of the United States Congress this morning as the Pesident of the Republic of Czechoslovakia, as a democrat with a small "d," as a man who, as he said, had been to no school for Presidents, had never sought political authority, had never had any ambition to lead in a political sense of the word, but who, as he said, came up through the school of life, and felt in that moment of transcendence when his country and his countrymen rose up and said, "We shall be free of all totalitarian influence, we shall make our own decisions, we shall adopt political pluralism, and we shall make our own decisions."

As the new President of Czechoslovakia told us this morning, it is time to shoulder some of the burdens and obligations of free men, and help lead his country into a new dawn where free decisions and free people will live freely and make those decisions in Czechoslovakia.

I cannot even begin to paraphrase President Havel's address and will not try to. The purpose of this reflection this morning is only one; that is, to commend to every school teacher in the United States of America, every student, whether they be students in school or whether they be aging students such as all us in the United States Congress, to write their Senator requesting a copy of the address of the new President of Czechoslovakia and to read for themselves and to their students what it means to be democratic with a small "d," and upon such truths this republic was founded and the emerging nations of Europe will attempt to emulate.

It is a matter, as President Havel said, of putting the human conscience and our ingrained sense of moral authority over any political authority, and in the end that will assure that the right decision is made. Even though, as he said to his American audience, we have 200 years of practicing this thing called "democracy" with no interruption of totalitarianism, he said, "As long as people are people, democracy in the full sense of the word will always be no more than an ideal; one may approach it as one would a horizon, in ways that may be better or worse, but it can never be fully attained. In this sense you, too—we Americans—are merely approaching democracy. You have thousands of problems of all kinds, as other countries do. But you have one great advantage: You have been approaching democracy uninterruptedly for more than 200 years and your journey toward that horizon has never been disrupted by a totalitarian system."

Oh, if we could learn that lesson and take it to heart, that in a free country our basic freedoms have to be earned over and over and over again, and there is no hope, there is no hope, of continuing to ensure these freedoms unless our children and students of all ages reread their Jefferson, reread their Franklin, reread not only the history of our country, but now the extraordinary changes that are taking place in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union where no totalitarian system has been able to conquer the mind and the heart of man.

Mr. President, Havel ended by saying,

> I will end where I began. History has accelerated. I believe that once again it will be the human mind that will notice this acceleration. Give it a name and transform those words into deeds.

I say to our friend, the poet-playwright, the President of Czechoslovakia, I think we already know what that name is—the name is truth. In older words than these, "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall set you free."

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Nevada is recognized.

CAMPAIGN REFORM

Mr. REID. Mr. President, we just returned from another week-long vacation, during which hundreds of hours were spent by Members of this body raising campaign money. It seems that with the experiences we had in 1988 and 1986 we would do something about reforming the campaign laws of this country.

I thought the experiences that I had in 1986 would never happen again. I hoped that before the elections held in 1988 there would be campaign reform, so that that campaign would be more directed toward issues than how much money a candidate has. In fact, that was not the case. Shortly it is going to be 4 years since the 1986 elections, and not a single thing has changed. I think it is time that this body and the other body recognize that it is going to take some action to change the law, to change the law so that the people that are voting for us have more than a 30-second spot on which to base a decision as to whether or not a person should serve in the U.S. Senate.

Mr. President, I am here to alert the Members of the Senate and the American public that now the 30-second spot may be something of the past, that the campaigns of the future are now looking at a 10-second spot. So instead of being buried in 30-second spots, the American public will be buried in 10-second spots. And, in that 10 seconds, a candidate will have the opportunity to discuss in detail all the many issues that face this country.

I think it is important to note that, recently, a Federal judge ordered the Federal Election Commission to act on complaints stemming from my 1986 campaign and other campaigns going on at that time. And the judge said, and I say today, that it is not the fault of the Federal Election Commission. They have been established as a toothless tiger, to have no power to do anything. In fact, it is now set up so that there are three of one party and three of the other, and so the tough decisions are simply not approached. They leave them, and they leave them, and leave them, until action by a Federal judge is necessitated.

So I think we should look at campaign ceilings, bundling, at independent expenditures and all those things. But also, Mr. President, let us look at streamlining the Federal Election Commission.

There are a lot of things on a wish list campaign reform proposal out there, and I think we should look at all of them. Let us do what is doable.

Senator MCCONNELL and I have introduced a campaign reform bill that is bipartisan and realistic, and includes measures that will make the 1990 elections and the 1992 elections much more fair. In effect, what this bill that Senator MCCONNELL and I introduced contains a look at bundling, at independent expenditures, broadcast discount rates and those things that are all bywords of the campaign proposal. But also it looks at streamlining the regulations of the Federal Elections Commission. Our bipartisan bill would reduce the amount of time in which the FEC is required to act and it would give the FEC the power to levy fines and penalties that hurt.

So Mr. President, I think it is important that we work as hard here in Washington for campaign reform as we do raising money during our vacation breaks when we go home.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I have a statement that is a little longer. I inquire of the Senator from Idaho how long he wants to speak.

Mr. SYMMS. About 3 minutes.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I think my colleague from Kentucky also has a short statement. I will proceed after them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is recognized.

Mr. SYMMS. Thank you very much.

I thank my friend from Massachusetts for his courtesies.

(The remarks of Mr. SYMMS pertaining to the introduction of S. 2150 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky is recognized.

Mr. McCONNELL. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. McCONNELL pertaining to the introduction of S. 2152 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

Mr. McCONNELL. I thank my friend from Massachusetts for yielding the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, are we operating under any time constraints at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no time limit. We are operating in morning business until 1:15 p.m.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. KERRY pertaining to the introduction of S. 2152 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

THE ELIMINATION OF GROUND-BASED SHORT-RANGE NUCLEAR WEAPONS IN EUROPE

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, we have just come from listening to an extraordinary speech from the President of Czechoslovakia. It is rare that leaders of the world today are willing, as Vaclav Havel was this morning, to place concepts of morality and personal ethics as the foundation of policy and politics. It is extraordinary that we hear from the President of a country those notions and those thoughts. They are really too absent from the political dialog of this country.

Part of what he said this morning is focused on what I rise to talk about before the Senate today. He spoke of the time that he hopes will come when Europe will be able to stand guard over itself. And he spoke of how history has accelerated and of the importance of us transferring words into deeds.

I rise today to respectfully suggest the means by which we can keep up with the acceleration of history, catch up with it, perhaps, and take a step to transform our own words into deeds.

Mr. President, the time has come for the United States and NATO to begin negotiations with the Soviet Union aimed at the elimination of ground-based nuclear weapons in Central Europe.

This will add a third zero to the double-zero we negotiated with the Soviets in the INF Treaty.

Today, East and West Germany are obviously moving rapidly toward unification under the aegis of the "Big Four," under the formula agreed to last week in Ottawa. Poland, Czechoslovakia,—as we heard retiterated to us this morning—and Hungary are not only no longer Communist countries, but they are actively seeking the removal of Soviet military forces from their national territories as well as they should. In this new world, the deployment of some 4,000 ground-based nuclear weapons by NATO, mostly in West Germany, and an even larger number of similar weapons by the Soviet Union located in East Germany, Poland, Czechoslovkia, and Hungary, simply makes no sense whatever.

These weapons are fast becoming anachronisms—held over from the time when they were deployed by NATO to balance the Soviet's greater number of conventional forces.

With the clear termination of that period, an opportunity is open to us through negotiation and political change to seek something else. Failure to remove these ground-based nuclear weapons may threaten the future of NATO itself by dividing German and United States interests at a critical moment in history.

By changing our policy now and seeking a ban on ground-based nuclear weapons, the United States can simultaneously exert political leadership in NATO, preserve the concepts of deterrence, and prevent the threat to NATO that could well take place if we simply sit there and do not change our policy or do nothing.

German unification under the "two-plus-four" formula agreed to in Ottawa on February 13 will require the United States, Soviet Union, United Kingdom, and France to rethink fundamental positions no matter what. Eliminating ground-based forces in Central and Eastern Europe is, I believe, an essential part of the military restructuring that has to flow if the words that Vaclav Havel espoused are indeed to be turned into deeds.

Last spring, the West German Government made it very clear to our Government how it felt about the United States proposal to deploy a new generation of Lance follow-on nuclear missiles in Germany—weapons that would increase the Lance's range from 70 miles to just under the 300-mile limit imposed by the INF Treaty.

West German Chancellor Helmut Kohl and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher told the United States last spring that West Germans would not accept new nuclear weapons in Germany that could be aimed at Lech Welesa's Poland or at the emerging non-Communist government in Hungary.

On May 30, 1989, NATO resolved this dispute, at least temporarily, by agreeing to postpone a decision on the deployment of Lance until 1992, and to begin negotiations with the Soviets on reductions in short-range nuclear forces in Europe to parity at low-levels following the conclusion of a treaty to reduce conventional forces.

This eased the growing tension that had developed between the United States and the FRG. But even then, the NATO agreement was largely cosmetic, rather than substantive. It deferred the debate over ground-based short-range nuclear forces, rather than disposed of it. And to state the obvious, perhaps, the understatement of the year, an enormous amount has changed in Europe since that time.

Moreover, the changes to date are but precursors to the next stage of change. In the next year, we will certainly see the Soviet Union roll back its military occupation in East Germany, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and Poland, as well as witness, rapid progress in Germany unification—probably along the lines proposed by German Foreign Minister Genscher, with East Germany becoming essentially a demilitarized zone of a united Germany.

Within the past month, we have already see the leaders of Hungary and Czechoslovakia formally advise the Soviets that they want Soviet forces out of their country, as has Lech Walesa in Poland. The Czech's timetable is to have two-thirds of the Soviet soldiers—some 50,000 to 60,000 occupying troops—out by mid-May, and total withdrawal by the end of 1990. Lech Walesa has requested the Soviets to be out of Poland by the end of 1990 as well. The Hungarian timetable would have the Soviets out by the end of 1991.

In the past month, the Soviets have formally agreed to begin negotiations with these nations on these issues. Last week, the four World War II powers and the two Germanys agreed on a structure for negotiations on German unification, which inherently will require a comprehensive plan for the removal of Soviet forces from East Germany for unification to take place.

In the past, the Soviet Union has resisted a troop pull out from Eastern and Central Europe, regardless of the number of troops we amassed in the West as evidence of our own strength of purpose. Our ground-based nuclear weapons in West Germany were always a counter to not only Soviet nuclear weapons, but their superior quality of conventional forces.

Now, by contrast, the continued presence of NATO's ground-based short range nuclear weapons in West Germany poses a potential obstacle to eliminating Soviet forces from Central and Eastern Europe. While it is probable the Soviets will unilaterally reduce some short-range nuclear weapons in Central and Eastern Europe as a result of negotiations with Czechoslovakia and Hungary, others will likely remain so long as NATO's remain. Thus the NATO policy has, at least on its face, the inherent consequence of permitting the Soviets to insist on retaining some Soviet bases and forces in East Germany at least, and possibly elsewhere in Eastern and Central Europe, to support the continued deployment of their ground-based nuclear weapons.

It is widely agreed that the 195,000 superpower troop limit on the continent proposed by President Bush and now accepted by Secretary Gorbachev is a first step toward broader cuts. Certainly, both West and East would be far better off with the removal of all Soviet forces from Eastern and Central Europe.

To reach this goal, we should press for the removal of Soviet ground-based short-range nuclear forces.

Yet the policy of the United States is instead to oppose any kind of ban on ground-based short range nuclear forces, and to postpone negotiations on any reductions of those forces for now. Indeed, in this year's defense budget, Secretary Cheney has requested $112 million for the procurement of a new generation of short-range nuclear weapons to be based in Germany. Not withstanding the stated opposition of the German Government to that fact.

It makes no sense for the United States to target nuclear weapons at a Germany that is being unified within the West, at a Poland governed by Solidarity and Lech Welesa, at a Czechoslovakia governed by Vaclav Havel, a humanist playwright and, as we learned this morning, a moralist and anti-Communist we consider our friend. And it makes even less sense in a unified Germany for Germany to find itself the host to nuclear weapons based in its west and its east pointed at each other.

An unchanged United States policy on nuclear modernization will alienate our European allies and may do more to endanger the NATO alliance than any further action the Soviet Union is likely to take.

The current policy of flexible response is based on an increasingly antiquated NATO strategy. It was devised to offset a massive conventional force imbalance in Europe in which the Soviets out-deployed NATO in almost every category of weapons and manpower.

But with the changes in Europe the balance has changed and will certainly change further.

The Warsaw Pact has essentially crumbled. The Soviets are dismantling their forces and pulling them out of Eastern and Central Europe. In a few months, we will have a treaty that limits the Soviets to conventional parity, at lower levels. Under this treaty, Soviet tanks facing Western Europe will be cut to one-third of what they were in 1988.

A U.S. policy based on common sense and on the new realities in Europe—and one better calculated to preserve NATO—would have the United States press for a Central and Eastern Europe completely free of ground-based nuclear weapons.

Ground-based nuclear weapons—nuclear artillery and short-range missiles—have short fuses at the early stages of a conflict. They are "use 'em or lose'em" weapons with the additional trait of having short delivery times. They are overwhelmingly aimed by both sides at countries now friendly to the United States.

Moreover, if one looks at ground-based short-range nuclear weapons strictly in terms of military balance issues, it is clear that eliminating these weapons would improve the balances of forces in Europe overall.

In recent years, the Soviet Union has retained approximately 1,600 short-range missile launchers in Eastern Europe, deployed in Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and East Germany. All are aimed principally at West Germany. All are under the direct control of the Soviet military. All require significant numbers of Soviet soldiers to support them.

By contrast, NATO possesses only about 96 short-range nuclear missile launchers—36 under the sole control of the United States and around 60 under dual-key arrangements with Belgium, the Netherlands, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, and the United Kingdom. That is a ratio of about 16 to 1 in the favor of the Soviets.

The Soviets have maintained an estimated 3,100 missiles associated with their 1,600 launchers, while the United States has maintained about 700 missiles associated with our 96 launchers, for a ratio in favor of the Soviets of better than 4 to 1 when it comes to the nuclear missiles themselves.

Similarly, the Soviet Union maintains a force of artillery that has been estimated to be as large as 10,000, a substantial portion of which are nuclear-capable. The United States has an estimated 2,000 nuclear artillery shells.

For each category of these weapons, the Soviet Union has personnel stationed in East Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary, amounting to at least 40,000 soldiers in all. At least 20 percent of all Soviet forces outside of the Soviet Union in Europe following a conventional force treaty under the new United States formula might remain in place solely to maintain and operate Soviet ground-based nuclear forces.

Thus, for both categories of short-range nuclear forces—missiles and dual capable artillery—it is in the national security interest of the United States, of NATO, of the Germanies, and of central and eastern Europe, to reduce that ratio to parity at zero.

Why zero? Put another way, why is the current NATO position that both sides should retain some short-range nuclear weapons at lower levels in central Europe wrong?

First, neither the United States nor its allies nor the newly emerging democracies in central and eastern Europe should want any Soviet nuclear missiles, supported by Soviet troops, in Eastern Europe, aimed at the West. Instead, we should insist that the Soviets remove every single last SS-21, Frog, and Scud missile from their former satellites: in other words, negotiate the last "zero" to complete the work the INF Treaty began.

Second, zero is much easier to verify than some. That was why the United States ultimately decided to negotiate double-zero, rather than low levels of INF weapons. In the words of U.S. Ambassador and space arms negotiator Max Kampleman when he testified in favor of the INF Treaty:

> It is simpler to verify a zero than a fixed number.

Third, zero is also the right number in terms of NATO's military strategy.

In tactical terms, it is already clear that the historic mission for NATO's ground-based nuclear forces is being obviated through unilateral Soviet reductions in conventional forces and through further negotiated conventional arms reductions. According to our own military experts, the risk of a short-warning offensive Soviet conventional attack on Western Europe today is practically nil. That threat, small as it is, should decrease further when we institutionalize conventional reductions through the Conventional Force Treaty.

In this new environment, eliminating ground-based nuclear weapons will reassure both sides that there need be no rush to mobilization should tensions rise, because neither side will have high-value weapons on the borders that could be overrun in a sudden clash of troops.

Zero is the right number for NATO strategically. After eliminating ground-based nuclear forces, both sides would still retain air-launched nuclear weapons to bolster deterrence. This will avoid "decoupling" the United States from Europe. No aggressor in Europe could cross a border without risking a nuclear response as the ultimate guarantor of those borders.

And finally, as the rapidly changing European order is demonstrating daily, zero is the right number in political terms. Central and eastern Europe cannot be free of the occupying Soviets forces without the elimination of ground-based nuclear weapons from Eastern Europe, thereby permitting the Soviet troops that support those weapons to go home.

There is no reason to wait on negotiating the removal of these weapons. Negotiations should begin now.

What should be NATO's goal in such negotiations?

Our goal should be nothing short of the total elimination of Soviet ground-based nuclear weapons from East Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary. To bring this about, we should be prepared to eliminate the United States ground-based nuclear weapons stationed in central Europe which could be used against Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and East Germany.

To reach this goal without increasing the risk to Western security at any time, the negotiation should link the removal of ground-based nuclear weapons to conventional force reductions, so that the West's short range nuclear forces will be withdrawn only after Soviet forces have been reduced to parity with the West, as specified in the conventional forces treaty to be signed later this year.

To ensure verifiability, the two sides should agree to withdraw all dual capable artillery based in the Germanies, Poland, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia, as well as all ground-based missiles capable of delivering nuclear warheads. This is consistent with the more defensive restructuring of forces that is a goal of the Vienna conventional force negotiations. To make verification of triple zero easier, and to make certain that the Soviets do not simply redeploy these weapons on Soviet territory, all the delivery systems covered by the treaty should be destroyed.

In addition, the two sides should agree to conduct onsite inspections of former nuclear storage sites and any suspect locales, to assure compliance by the Soviets down to zero. Obviously, such compliance will be far easier to demonstrate if all Soviet forces are withdrawn from central and eastern Europe.

This new and more stable regime would be reinforced by the rapid conclusion of a chemical weapons treaty with the Soviets, whereby chemical weapons would also be removed from central Europe to zero in sequence, with NATO reductions beginning only once the Soviets were down to parity in chemical stockpiles. Earlier this month, Secretary Baker and Soviet leader Gorbachev announced that both nations were accelerating efforts to conclude a treaty on chemicals soon.

It would be preferable ultimately to abolish all ground-based nuclear weapons in Europe, but political complications may make it more feasible to initially limit the elimination of these weapons to central and eastern Europe: Belgium, West Germany, Luxembourg, Denmark, and the Netherlands for NATO, and Czechoslovakia, East Germany, Poland, and Hungary for the Warsaw Pact.

This central zone limit would accommodate the intention expressed by British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher to retain short-range nuclear weapons in the United Kingdom. It would also permit a treaty to be negotiated without the approval of the Government of France, which may wish to maintain its short-range pluton ballistic missiles.

While a broader Atlantic-to-the Urals ban is preferable as a long-range goal, a central zone ban on ground-based nuclear weapons would transform central and eastern Europe by placing all the ground-based nuclear weapons retained by either alliance far from any potential future conflict. The range of the ground-based nuclear weapons that remained deployed outside central and eastern Europe would fall far short of the areas that have long been the critical fault-lines between East and West.

The location of any remaining Soviet weapons would have shifted more than 800 miles east, from the intra-German border along the Elbe to the Soviet border with Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary. In the West, French short-range systems could not reach beyond West German territory. This rear-development of remaining ground-based nuclear weapons would create an important new measure of stability for all of Europe.

A triple zero treaty would not cover nuclear-capable aircraft. It is impossible to eliminate all such aircraft, since virtually any combat aircraft can deliver a nuclear weapon. There are also important differences between ground-based and air-based nuclear weapons that make the latter less threatening to stability. Because aircraft have long ranges, their nuclear munitions can be and are stored far away from a military front, making them less vulnerable, less likely to be overrun at the start of a conflict.

Moreover, nuclear-capable aircraft, with their longer ranges and greater mobility, have missions that go beyond threatening those populations that happen to live near the historic East-West border in Europe.

As Alfred Dregger, of the Christian Democratic Union, and Volker Ruhe, the general secretary of the Christian Democratic Party, the governing party in West Germany, have been quoted saying, "the shorter the range of the weapons, the deader the Germans." The current Lance missiles in place in Germany have a range of about 68 miles or less. The nuclear artillery's range is even shorter—about 18 miles.

When it comes to nuclear weapons in East Germany massed on the West German border, and in West Germany on the East German border, German opinion is already unified. Germans of every major political party on both sides of the border have opposed the introduction of new short-range nuclear weapons and have remained distinctly uncomfortable with the old ones.

It is hard to imagine even a partially reunified Germany tolerating a situation in which it retained thousands of short-range nuclear weapons with no enemy in range, and targeted against no one other than itself.

The crisis in United States-West German relations which took place last spring was but a prelude to the storm brewing if the United States does not recognize the reality of the new German situation. Even last spring, 89 percent of the public in West Germany opposed new American short-range weapons, and West Germany was joined by the governments of Denmark, Norway, Belgium, Spain, and Greece in calling for early talks on removing short-range nuclear weapons.

Last year, the West Germans merely asked us to delay insisting on modernization. Within the past few weeks, they have declared modernization dead. And now, they are beginning to suggest that it is time for the old nuclear systems to be eliminated as well.

"The question of nuclear modernization makes us laugh," one West German official told the New York Times on November 21. "What do we need those missiles for?" the official asked, "to bomb Lech Walesa?"

By January 12 this year, Foreign Minister Genscher told reporters that he did "not expect a positive decision by NATO on modernization." He said he anticipated that 1990 would be a year not of rearmament, but of disarmament.

Later in the month, Genscher went still further. On January 28, 1990, the German newspaper Bild AM Sonntag published an interview in which Genscher stated that short-range nuclear weapons and nuclear artillery "have no more place in our time."

And on February 2, in a Nuremburg newspaper interview, Genscher repeated that the German Government was opposed to modernizing short-range nuclear weapons of the kind that would be aimed at Vaclav Havel and Lech Walesa, and reiterated that "short-range nuclear weapons no longer have any place in the current political landscape."

In this environment, the statement made last May by President Bush that "there will be no third zero," is outdated. The policy, made before the events in Eastern Europe were anticipated by the policymakers, has been overtaken by events.

Yet even last May, the President recognized that Europe had already begun to change. He said then that to survive, the NATO alliance must "move beyond the era of containment."

Ground-based nuclear weapons in central and eastern Europe are in remnants of a time when the Soviet Union was determined to maintain military control over satellite countries to be controlled forever by Communist parties, and a time when the West could only respond with the policy of containment.

I suggest respectfully, Mr. President, that as Vaclav Havel said to us today, "History has accelerated." That time has passed.

Today, the United States can help build upon the momentum to free Germany, East and West, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary from the position of being held hostage by thousands of ground-based short-range nuclear weapons.

If we use our influence and our presence to help create a new European order, an order such as Vaclav Havel referred to this morning, where Europe can stand guard for itself; if we can help to do that, free of ground-based nuclear weapons, we will vindicate our traditional position in NATO, and strengthen the alliance even in a time of accelerating change.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LIEBERMAN). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

CONGRESS-BUNDESTAG STAFF EXCHANGE

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following announcement of the 1990 Congress-Bundestag staff exchange be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the announcement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE 1990 CONGRESS-BUNDESTAG STAFF EXCHANGE

Since 1983 the United States Congress and the West German Parliament, the Bundestag, have conducted an annual exchange program in which staff members from both countries observe and learn about the workings of each other's political constitutions first hand and convey the views of members from both sides on issues faced by both countries. The exchange also provides an opportunity for the development of professional relationships which will be beneficial to both countries over the long term.

This exchange program is one of several sponsored by both public and private institutions in the United States and West Germany to foster better understanding of the institutions and policies of both countries.

This year, eight congressional staff members will visit Germany April 21 to May 6. They will spend about 10 days in Bonn attending meetings conducted by members of the Bundestag, Bundestag staffers, and representatives of political, business, labor, academic, and media institutions. They will spend a weekend in the district of a Bundestag member. The program will conclude with a visit to Berlin during which the delegates will meet with representatives of the West Berlin Government and U.S. Government representatives in both West and East Berlin.

A comparable delegation of Bundestag staffers will come to the United States in late June for a 3-week period. They will attend similar meetings here in Washington and will visit the districts of Members of Congress over the Fourth of July recess.

The program is truly a two-way street; accordingly, participants should be experienced Hill staffers so that they can contribute to the success of the exchange on both sides of the Atlantic. The Bundestag sends senior staffers to the United States and a number of high ranking members of the Bundestag take the time to meet with our staffers. The United States has tried to reciprocate.

Therefore, participants should have a demonstrable interest in, if not some direct responsibility for, political, security, trade, or environmental issues as they relate to Europe in general and Germany in particular. In addition, U.S. participants will be expected to help plan and execute the program for the Bundestag staffers when they visit the United States. Among the contributions participants should expect to make are the planning and the conducting of topical meetings for the Bundestag staffers and hosting one or two of the staffers in their Member's district over the Fourth of July.

Applications for participation in the United States delegation will be reviewed initially by the congressional staff Group on German-American Affairs; final selection of the delegation will be made by the United States Information Agency.

Senators and Representatives who would like a member of their staff to apply for participation in this year's program should direct them to submit a resume and cover letter in which they state why they believe that they are qualified and giving some assurance of their ability to participate during the time stated to [Bob Maynes, Office of Senator DeConcini, 328 Senate Hart Office Building] by Thursday, March 1.

TRIBUTE TO DR. WILLIAM O. DAVIES, TECHNICAL DIRECTOR, U.S. ARMY STRATEGIC DEFENSE COMMAND, HUNTSVILLE, AL

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, one of this Nation's most valuable national assets is located in Huntsville, AL, a widely recognized center of excellence in both military and civil aerospace technology. Both the U.S. Army and NASA's Marshall Space Flight Center provide an unequaled source of technological expertise for the Nation and will play an important part in this Nation's future.

Particularly notable is the U.S. Army Strategic Defense Command located in Huntsville's Research Park which has been researching technology to defend this country against nuclear ballistic missiles for more than 30 years. During this time, the Army has become a leader in the fields of optics, lasers, neutral particle beams, kinetic-kill interceptors, nuclear hardening, and distributed data processing. This work has provided the foundation for much of today's strategic defense initiative and promises to continue to foster the needed technological advances for the future security of this Nation.

The Strategic Defense Command's advanced research center in Huntsville was the first operational mode of SDIO's national test bed, a unique computer simulation facility used as systems analysis/battle management tool to aid in strategic defense planning. This is just one example among many.

Today, I want to honor an individual who has contributed greatly to this distinguished record that the U.S. Army Strategic Defense Command has achieved: Dr. William O. Davies.

Dr. Davies is technical director, U.S. Army Strategic Defense Command. He has held key executive positions in the U.S. Army ballistic missile defense organization for more than 20 years. In that time he has been instrumental in establishing system concepts and technology that have enhanced the Nation's strategic defense posture.

He has served as the top civilian manager of the U.S. Army Strategic Defense Command's billion-dollar-plus annual Strategic Technology Program since 1986. In this capacity, he has provided the command's leadership for preparation for the Defense Acquisition Board reviews that resulted in decisions to pursue many key Army technologies.

He directed studies that led to the Army being assigned the lead in the development of a land-based, kinetic energy antisatellite [Asat] system for the Nation. As a result, an Asat joint program office, headed by an Army brigadier general, is colocated with the U.S. Army Strategic Defense Command in Huntsville to take advantage of kinetic energy technology being pursued for SDIO.

He also oversaw the command's transition to Ada software and established a commandwide total quality management program.

As director of the systems development directorate—and its successor, the systems analysis and battle management directorate—from 1985 through 1989, Dr. Davies was responsible for formulation and assessment of BMD system concepts. In this role he led development of the first computerized SDI battle management simulation as well as directed global sensor network experiments for early identification of system integration issues.

From 1969 through 1984, Dr. Davies was director of the Army BMD Advanced Technology Center's optics directorate. Dr. Davies directed the Optics Program that established a military capability for cold-background sensors that operate in a space and hostile environment, and is the technology basis for the current SDIO optical sensor surveillance concepts. He also directed the Army's pre-SDI free electron laser efforts, which are the basis for the country's next generation high power laser.

Prior to entering Government service, Dr. Davies was employed as a physicist by IIT Research Institute and Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. in a series of increasingly responsible positions.

Dr. Davies is a native of Akron, OH. He holds a bachelors degree in physics from Oberlin College, masters degree in physics from the University of Akron, and doctor's degree in technology management from Southeastern Institute of Technology. He is the author of more than 50 publications in the fields of chemical physics, reentry physics, space flight, and strategic technology.

With these kinds of accomplishments to his credits, it is no surprise that Dr. Davies was recently named Engineer of the Year by Region II of the American Institute of Aeronautics and Astronautics [AIAA].

In December 1989, Dr. Davies was 1 of only 11 senior Army executives to receive a Presidential Rank Award of Meritorious Executive which includes a $10,000 cash award. At that time, Davies' award nomination cited him for "innovative leadership and dedication to the public interest that have been instrumental in establishing systems and technology to support the President's strategic defense vision. His personal initiative has been the driving force for technology advances that offer revolutionary improvements in surveillance and strategic defense. He has served as a catalyst for industry-university-government cooperative efforts critical to the success of this complex program."

He has also been named BMD Senior Executive of the Year and has received repeated awards for outstanding performance.

Dr. Davies' accomplishments reflect credits not only on himself and the U.S. Army Strategic Defense Command, but on Alabama and the United States of America. It is people like this—skilled, trained professionals—that make our country strong.

Thank you, Mr. President.

REGARDING EDUCATION FOR DEMOCRACY, USA

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise today to inform my colleagues of an organization which was recently formed in the United States to further democracy and progress for the citizens of Czechoslovakia. I am proud to report that the head office for this organization—Education for Democracy, USA—is located in my home State of Alabama, in the city of Mobile.

The past year has brought enormous change to the political landscape of Eastern Europe including that of Czechoslovakia. President Havel has been leading the charge of democracy across Czechoslovakia and I am confident that this program will help his efforts. He has recently asked American teachers and businessmen to travel to Czechoslovakia to help with the transition to democracy. He has also asked the Peace Corps to send about 60 people to teach English. These requests together with the willingness of the Czech people to learn English and promote democracy show the importance of Education for Democracy, USA.

In light of the address given today by President Havel before a joint session of Congress, I believe this is an appropriate time to acquaint Members with this program.

On the premise that democracy in Czechoslovakia would be furthered by developing an understanding of the English language and cultivating interaction with Western ideas and people, this organization was formed a few months ago in Toronto, Canada, by a gentleman named John Hasek. He obtained agreement from the Czechoslovak Government to support the presence of English as a second language instructors in every Czechoslovak college and university. Already, many Canadians have arrived in Czechoslovakia to begin teaching English to some of the estimated 70 percent of the student population who are eager to participate in this program.

A few weeks ago, Mr. Hasek visited Mobile, AL, to meet with Ann Gardner, who was interested in starting a U.S. chapter of this organization. That initial meeting and local press have resulted in an overwhelming expression of interest from people in Mobile. College students, professors, attorneys, retirees, and others are currently making plans to travel to Czechoslovakia.

I am encouraged by the support which this program has found in the Mobile area. In the few weeks since Mrs. Gardner began the U.S. chapter of the program—Education for Democracy, USA—there have been close to 100 Mobilians who have expressed interest in the program. In fact, two individuals are scheduled to leave for Czechoslovakia in just 2 weeks.

Volunteers must have an excellent command of the English language, a valid passport, transportation to and from Czechoslovakia and be in good health. Upon their arrival in Czechoslovakia, they will participate in an orientation program and be taken to their designated facilities where they will be provided with lodging and board at a student residence or in the home of individual students and families. By housing these instructors with the Czechoslovakian families and students, both sides will get exposure to the other language and culture.

Instructors will teach English for approximately 4 hours per day, 5 days per week for 2 to 6 months. The Czechoslovakian Government will pay the instructors a base stipend of 1,200 crowns per month, which may be supplemented by the individual institutions depending upon the academic credentials of the instructors.

Mr. President, the opportunities which this program provides for increasing the understanding and good will between our two countries are phenomenal. I hope that people from all across our Nation will follow the fine example which I am proud to say has been set in Mobile, AL, and support this program in every which way they can.

I will continue to support this program and am hopeful my colleagues will strive to promote it in their home States. I also hope that we will be able to locate funds which will assist the Education for Democracy Program in fulfilling its mission.

Thank you, Mr. President.

FIGHTING IN LEBANON

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, yet another round of fighting has erupted in Beirut. Once again, we read of hundreds killed and thousands wounded. Once again, we read of great human suffering and massive property damage.

But this time, the fighting is not between East and West Beirut, between Lebanese Muslim and Lebanese Christian. It is between Lebanese Christians alone. For more than a week now, the Lebanese Christian Militia of Samir Ja'Ja' and the Christian Army troops loyal to General Aoun have been battling one another, principally in East Beirut, but also elsewhere in Lebanon's Christian enclave.

Regrettably, such internecine warfare is well known in Lebanon, within both the Christian and Moslem communities. Indeed, just before this outbreak of intra-Christian fighting, battles between Lebanese Shiites raged in West Beirut and South Lebanon.

All internecine fighting in Lebanon, whether it pits Christian against Christian, or Moslem against Moslem, makes a mockery of any hope for Lebanese unity. What chance is there for a unified Lebanon when the constituent communities of that tragic country are themselves driven by violent struggle? How will Lebanese Christian and Moslem live in peaceful union when their own religious communities are so internally divided?

I join Maronite Patriarch Sfeir in urging an immediate cease-fire. I urge all parties to the fighting to negotiate their differences. The Lebanese people have suffered far too long, and Lebanon's communal and national suicide must stop.

Mr. President, I know that other Senators on both sides of the aisle share my concern about the continuing carnage in Lebanon. I wish, therefore, to call their attention to an excellent speech on Lebanon by the distinguished minority leader in Los Angeles, CA.

In addition to calling for the immediate withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon, Senator DOLE strongly supported the appointment of a special United States Envoy for Lebanon.

I wish to associate myself with Senator DOLE's call for a special envoy. Appointing a special United States Envoy is a must, certainly as long as our Embassy in Lebanon remains closed. It is, in fact, the only way to ensure that the issue of Lebanon commands attention at the highest levels of the Bush administration.

Mr. President, I know my colleagues will be interested in the full text of Senator DOLE's remarks, and I ask that the his speech be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH BY SENATOR DOLE BEFORE THE AMERICAN TASK FORCE FOR LEBANON AWARDS DINNER, LOS ANGELES, CA

I am truly honored to receive the Philip C. Habib Award.

I'm also honored to be following in the footsteps of last year's recipient, Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell. He's a great Democrat—I happen to be a Republican. Each of us is proud of our party—and I admit it: I want his job—majority leader.

But any partisanship we have is tempered by a real friendship, and by mutual respect.

And when it comes to the issue of Lebanon, George Mitchell and Bob Dole have always been, and will continue to be, of one mind.

I CARE ABOUT LEBANON

Like many of you, I've come a long way to attend tonight's dinner. I've made the journey for one reason above all others—I care deeply about Lebanon.

We live in a remarkable time. Every day, our headlines tell anew of people long oppressed, seizing their own freedom; taking control of their own future.

For most of us, it is the most hopeful time in this century. A time when tyranny, foreign domination and deprivation seem to be melting away in places from Panama to Poland.

Yet Lebanon's long night of death and destruction continues.

Foreign forces occupy the country, with a choke hold on national sovereignty.

Radical forces terrorize the population, Lebanese and foreign.

Innocent commerce has been nearly snuffed out—while illicit markets in human lives, lethal arms, and deadly drugs flourish.

As it has for months, Lebanon teeters on a critical edge—and any new missteps can bring the final destruction of that great nation.

SPEAK OUT!

By contrast, only the most extraordinary efforts—by Lebanese, by the leaders of the nations of the world, by us—only the most extraordinary efforts can save Lebanon. Your presence here demonstrates that you are not prepared to stand by and watch that nation—the nation of your families and friends—disappear from history.

But what can you—what can we—do?

The first order of business is to speak out. Clearly, persistently.

I spoke a moment ago about headlines. Like it or not, ours is a political system too often driven by headlines.

Today's crisis is tomorrow a vague memory. Today's top priority is tomorrow lost in the shuffle of more pressing business.

We have to face the facts: for too many in Washington, Lebanon has fallen off the screen. The only "issues list" that it tops—is the list of those issues to avoid like the plague.

To many politicians, it is too complex, too sensitive. To national security planners, it is too dangerous.

Saddest of all, for many people—it is simply seen as too late; Lebanon, many say, is already lost.

Those are the facts of life in Washington in 1990. If we allow those attitudes to persist and prevail; if we become too preoccupied with our own problems—then we will share the blame for Lebanon's demise.

We cannot let that happen.

You in the task force are pledged to see that it won't happen. tonight, I renew to you my pledge—I won't let it happen, either.

SPECIAL U.S. ENVOY

And let me be specific: one way to insure that the issue of Lebanon enjoys the priority it must have—is to implement the proposal of the task force, that we have a special American envoy for Lebanon; someone who will devote full time and attention to Lebanon; someone who will make it clear that the United States is serious about Lebanon.

But it is not enough to just speak out. We must talk sense.

Talking sense about Lebanon starts with putting first things first.

The first priority must be an end foreign intervention. Until that is accomplished, no other permanent progress is possible.

ALL FOREIGN FORCES OUT

There is no need to equivocate.

All foreign forces must leave Lebanon—starting right now.

Some reports say Syria has agreed to a "secret timetable" for the withdrawal of its forces, at least to the Bekka Valley. I hope those reports are true, and that the "secret timetable" will lead to a rapid, total withdrawal of Syria's forces.

When I visited Morocco last August, I spoke to King Hassan about the issue of Lebanon. I strongly urged him to persist in his efforts, as part of the Tripartite Committee, with Saudi Arabia and Algeria. The leaders of those nations have worked hard. They deserve our admiration and thanks.

But they must do more.

Their agenda is not complete, and won't be, until they have secured binding commitments for the withdrawal of all Syrian Forces.

Tonight, I call on the Arab League to renew its efforts to pin down that timetable with Assad; and to let the world—and, more imporant, the people of Lebanon—know that it is real and binding on Damascus.

KEEP THE HEAT ON SYRIA

Now let me say candidly: I'm not holding my breath.

I believe there is no practical alternative to giving the Arab League the lead, and I hope it will keep pushing. But it cannot do the job without the strong, supporting pressure of an active American diplomacy.

We can't continue to "sit this one out." We must step up our direct diplomacy—yes, our pressure—on Syria.

We cannot pull our punches in Damascus, in the hope that it will somehow make Assad more willing to join in a broader peace process in the Middle East. Lebanon cannot be that kind of "sideshow" to a "center stage" effort to bring others to the bargaining table.

The fact is, we're not going to have that broader Middle East peace as long as Lebanon lies bleeding to death. With Assad, Lebanon should be our first thought—not an afterthought.

BAKER/SHEVARDNADZE

And I want to make a related point. Next week, Secretary Baker will sit down with Foreign Minister Shevardnadze—to discuss, among other key topics, so-called "regional conflicts."

I have a candidate item for the very top of the agenda: Soviet policy toward Syria.

Yesterday, My Senate colleague from California, Pete Wilson, and I sent a letter to Secretary Baker. We urged that Baker deliver this clear message to Shevardnadze: as long as Moscow gives Assad the "green Light" for aggression in Lebanon, the United States will keep out the "yellow caution light" on the path of U.S.-Soviet relations.

The recent rumors of Gorbachev's political demise now appear to have been premature. But one thing is clear to me: with his party in shambles, his country falling apart, and his economy flat on its back—Gorbachev doesn't have many cards to play. He needs us—desperately.

It is in our interest to see Gorbachev succeed. But we can, and should, extract a price for any "helping hand" we extend. And a part of that price ought to be more responsible Soviet policies toward Syria.

LEBANON BELONGS TO THE LEBANESE

Let me be clear about this, too: when I say "all foreign forces"—I mean all foreign forces.

Lebanon belongs to the Lebanese: not to the Syrians, not to the Iranians—and not to the Israelis, either.

The only lasting solution to the problem of Lebanon is a unified Lebanese Government, in control of all of the territory of a democratic Lebanon.

I have spoken, to this point, about what we should do, and what others—the Soviets, the Syrians, the Iranians and the Israelis—what they should do.

But, finally, what will be really decisive is what the Lebanese, themselves, do. Lebanon belongs to the Lebanese—and it is both the right, and the responsibility, of the Lebanese to carve out their own future.

BOTH SIDES: END THE BLOODSHED

Let me speak frankly: the Syrians, the Soviets, and the neglect of some in Washington—all these are barriers to a solution to Lebanon's problems.

But the fact is—the biggest barrier to the creation of a peaceful, united, democratic Lebanon—is the unwillingness of some Lebanese to put the needs of the Nation of Lebanon above narrower interest.

There is plenty of blame to go around. It is neither my place, nor my intention, to point the finger at anyone, or any faction, or any religion.

I do believe it is my responsibility, as someone who cares deeply about Lebanon, to plead with every faction and every Lebanese leader—end the senseless killing; join together with a unified demand for the withdrawal of all foreign forces; and go on, in a spirit of patriotism and not factionalism, to a serious dialogue about the political future of Lebanon.

Specifically, now—I call on both sides in Christian East Beirut to halt their bloody test of might and will. Many of the causes that the Christians of Lebanon espouse are just and urgent causes—but none of those causes are served when Christian kills Christian.

STAND UP FOR LEBANON

Ladies and gentlemen: we are here tonight because we care about Lebanon; and because the crisis in Lebanon demands our persistent, personal involvement.

If we don't stand up for Lebanon now—who will?

It is our job. We can't duck it. Let us join together, and get the job done.

USA TODAY'S ALL-USA COLLEGE ACADEMIC FIRST TEAM

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, while it is common for public attention to be focused on outstanding college and university athletes, college students who excel in the classroom rather than on the playing field receive far too little recognition. I am pleased to note that the newspaper USA Today has taken a significant step toward remedying that situation when it recently honored 20 college undergraduates for outstanding scholarship, intellectual achievement and leadership by naming them to the All-USA College Academic First Team.

This diverse group of men and women, ranging in age from 18 to 39, was chosen from among 749 scholars nominated by their colleges and universities. Forty other students were named to the All-USA College Academic Second and Third Teams.

Candidates were judged on academic performance, honors, awards, rigor of academic pursuits and the ability to express themselves in writing. The two criteria given the most weight by judges were outstanding individual scholarship or intellectual achievement and leadership in activities on or off campus.

USA Today and the other cosponsors of the All-USA College Academic Teams—the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities, the National Association of State Universities and Land-Grant Colleges, the American Association of Colleges for Teacher Education, and the Council for the Advancement and Support of Education—are to be commended for honoring these outstanding college students and telling their inspirational stories to millions of people across the Nation.

ALL-USA COLLEGE ACADEMIC FIRST TEAM

The 20 All-USA College Academic First Team members, who were honored on January 19, 1990 at a ceremony in Arlington, VA, are:

William Bien, senior, Ohio State University, Columbus;

Joseph Bliss, senior, Ithaca (NY) College;

Gerrie Bork, senior, Carroll College, Waukesha, WI;

Peter Boyer, junior, Rhode Island College, Providence;

Lori Brandt, senior, University of Iowa, Iowa City;

Jacqueline Chun, junior, University of Hawaii, Honolulu;

Shannon French, senior, Trinity University, San Antonio, TX;

Anita Fusco, senior, St. Francis College, Loretto, PA;

Hugh Herr, senior, Millersville (Pa.) University;

Karen Loeb, senior, New York University;

Paul Marushka, senior, University of Chicago in my home State of Illinois;

Shannon Mattiace, senior, Central College, Pella, IA;

Anna Miler, senior, Missouri Southern State College, Joplin;

Clark Miller, another student from my home State, a senior at the University of Illinois, Champaign;

Talia McCray, senior, Bennett College, Greensboro, NC;

William O'Dowd, senior, Creighton University, Omaha, NE;

Richard Ross, senior, University of Missouri at Columbia;

Donna Slaughter, senior, Hannibal-LaGrange College, Missouri;

Leonard Stark, junior, University of Delaware, Newark; and Muneesh Tewari, senior, Case Western Reserve University, Cleveland.

My only regret is that my fine alma mater, Dana College in Nebraska, does not have anyone placed on this list.

The All-USA College Academic First Team was addressed by Dr. J. Dennis Huston, professor of English at Rice University and the College Professor of the Year, and Dr. John Brademas, our distinguished former colleague in Congress from Indiana and former House Majority Whip, now president of New York University.

Mr. President, I ask that Dr. Brademas' remarks on the occasion of the selection of the All-USA College Academic First Team be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF JOHN BRADEMAS, PRESIDENT, NEW YORK UNIVERSITY

I am honored to have been asked to take part in this tribute to the members of the first-ever All-USA College Academic First Team.

At the outset I want to applaud the sponsors of this program. USA TODAY and its parent company, Gannett, are accustomed to making history in the media world; now they've made history in the world of education by for the first time extending national recognition to college and university students of outstanding academic achievement.

USA TODAY has been ably assisted in this venture by four of the nation's most respected organizations devoted to higher learning: the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities, the National Association of State Universities and Land-Grant Colleges, the American Association of Colleges of Teacher Education, and the Council for the Advancement and Support of Education.

We gather today for what I believe a most significant and imaginative gesture on the part of a society that aspires to be civilized. We want to honor those among our young who, by their accomplishments, have demonstrated a deep commitment to learning.

FAITH IN THE POWER OF EDUCATION

By acknowledging in this public way the achievements of these young men and women, we proclaim our faith in the power of education.

Certainly this is a faith I have held throughout my own life and so I find it easy to speak with conviction on the subject.

As the son of a Greek immigrant and an Indiana schoolteacher, I grew up in a family for whom education was paramount. So intense was my father's feeling that he used to say, "John, I'll never leave much money to my children but I will leave you all a first-class education." And he did.

That education for me included Harvard and a Rhodes scholarship to Oxford. That I should have been able to study at two of the finest universities in the world impressed deeply on me the importance of an opportunity for education. Scholarships and the G.I. Bill helped open the doors of higher learning to me.

Education remained a central focus of my professional life. In 1958—and on my third try—I was elected to the United States House of Representatives and throughout my time in Congress—22 years—I served on the committee, Education and Labor, with principal responsibility for legislation to assist schools, colleges and universities, and other institutions of learning and culture.

Here I note, too, that the district I represented in Congress was home to no fewer than six colleges and universities, including the University of Notre Dame.

Today, I have the privilege of serving as president of New York University, the largest private university in the world, with 47,000 students in 14 schools, colleges and divisions and an annual budget exceeding $1 billion.

And if I may for a moment put on my hat as university president, I want warmly to congratulate two students from New York University who have been selected for the All-USA College Academic Teams.

Named to the second team is an NYU undergraduate history major, Gianmarco M. Masoni.

KAREN LOEB OF NEW YORK UNIVERSITY

And chosen for the first team, and with us today, is a senior majoring in psychobiology and planning a career in pediatrics. Her father is also an active alumnus of NYU. A straight-A student, a leader on campus and a founder of the university's tutoring program for homeless children, this young woman richly deserves the honor you bestow on her today—and she also brings, in turn, great honor to her university. May I here salute: Karen Loeb.

Now from what I have told you, you can see that education has been a leitmotif of my own life.

My experiences have led me to believe in the indispensability of education in the development of a person's mind and the shaping of his or her character. And I am convinced, too, that essential to our capacity to build a nation strong both in economic and material terms and in the quality of our intellectual and cultural life is education.

So I should like today to say a few words about both these dimensions of the value of education—the contribution it makes to the individual and to the wider society.

Although the students we honor today come from different backgrounds and have followed different academic paths, common to them all is a set of standards by which they have guided themselves.

A SET OF STANDARDS

What are these standards?

First, they believe that increasing the power of the mind calls for the same dedication and discipline as developing physical strength and skills.

This awards ceremony, in turn, signals our belief that intellectual achievement is as deserving of recognition as accomplishment in athletic competition . . . indeed, in my view, much more so!

Clearly, one of the themes of this event, the establishment of a college academic team, is that while it is appropriate that we salute those who do well on the playing field, the time has long since come when we should be paying tribute to those who demonstrate first-class brainpower.

Here let me note an initiative at New York University that I think relates to what I am saying.

NYU, with the leadership of our Chancellor and Executive Vice President for Academic Affairs, L. Jay Oliva, helped create the University Athletic Association—a group of private urban research universities committed to the highest standards of academic achievement as well as to providing an exciting student athletic program.

Members of the UAA—NYU, the University of Chicago, Johns Hopkins, Brandeis, Case Western Reserve, Carnegie-Mellon, Emory, University of Rochester and Washington University at St. Louis—give no athletic scholarships. Although we believe in both, we give primacy to academics over athletics.

And as I speak of scholarship and learning, let me here acknowledge the dedicated men and women who comprise the American professoriate, represented here today by one of their most respected members, the "College Professor of the Year" and professor of English at Rice University, Dr. J. Dennis Huston. I salute Professor Huston as well.

EXCELLENCE, NOT MEDIOCRITY

A second precept that has motivated the young persons on the All-USA College Academic First Team is that excellence, not mediocrity, is the only goal worth having.

On this point, I can do no better than repeat the wisdom of my Hellenic ancestors. For this, according to the Greeks, is the true definition of happiness: "The exercise of vital powers along lines of excellence in a life according them scope."

Nor do I here equate excellence with success. The eloquent sportswriter Thomas Boswell of the Washington Post warns of the obsession with winning that results from confusing the two.

Success, says Boswell, is measured externally . . . by comparison with others; success is often beyond our personal control and moreover, it is perishable.

Excellence, on the other hand, is an internal quality, a consequence in large measure of the capacity and of the commitment of an individual. Excellence, therefore, endures.

And here, I respectfully suggest, are two other rules these students have followed:

That active engagement in human affairs brings greater satisfaction than cool indifference; and, closely related, that a concern for others, not simply self-seeking, is the mark of a humane and accomplished man or woman.

Now if these several standards, these rules for living, sound old-fashioned, it is because they are—but no less true for that.

Indeed, I would assert that the values embodied in these rules are today more relevant than ever.

Why do I say this?

THE TASKS FACING THE NATION

Consider the tasks that face us as a Nation as we enter the final decade of the 20th century.

The world is being recast before our eyes by the dramatic political and economic changes in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. The grip of Communism is everywhere loosening and we are entering a period of tremendous hope—and tremendous challenge.

Can the Soviet Union and the nations of Eastern Europe break away from totalitarian systems of government and controlled economies without breaking up in the process?

How should we in the United States react to the prospect of the new European Community scheduled to come into being in 1992?

Beyond Europe, how should we respond to the rising economic powers of the Pacific? To the declining economic prospects of the Third World?

Here at home we face a daunting array of problems: budget deficits and trade deficits, AIDS and drugs, pollution, poverty, homelessness, inadequate health care and deteriorating schools.

It must be obvious that to cope effectively with such challenges, domestic and foreign, we require intelligence of the first order—the kind represented by the students here today.

Yet there is a larger point that I want to make. It is that in order to undertake the tasks before us, we must have, in addition to qualities of intellect and insight, certain qualities of character: integrity and accountability, concern and commitment courage and compassion.

For as you may have noticed, these characteristics, especially in the public arena, have lately been in short supply.

The last few years have revealed a disturbing story about the ethical perspectives of people in positions of leadership in many sectors of American life: insider trading on Wall Street; conflicts of interest on Capitol Hill; waste, fraud and abuse in Federal agencies; convictions in City Hall; illicit activities of athletic heroes; preachers who pray for money more than souls.

Given these examples of life in the so-called "real world," what should American college students today think? How should they respond?

Should they retreat from the world? Enter a monastery? Join an ashram?

Should they conform to the world? Go for a quick buck? Look for moral shortcuts?

CAREERS IN PUBLIC SERVICE

No. I would suggest another route altogether—and it is one clearly chosen by the students we honor today; active engagement in a society that needs their talents, idealism and energy as never before.

In fact, I take advantage of this occasion to voice the hope that more well-educated, highly motivated young Americans—like those who sit before me today—will, as they complete their studies, consider careers in public service.

Such careers could include working in the nonprofit world of foundations and social service agencies, or could mean positions in state and local government.

They could mean working for the Federal government as a career civil servant or diplomat, or even deciding as I first did thirty-six years ago, to take the plunge into the rough and tumble of electoral politics.

At a moment when we as a Nation are in desperate need of men and women fired with what the great American historian Henry Steele Commager has described as "the passion for public service that animated the foundation fathers," I express the hope that more talented young people will choose that avenue along which to "exercise their vital powers."

Let me add a final note about the enterprise that helped nurture the outstanding students before us. It seems to me that essential to meeting the challenges of the new decade and the next century is a healthy system of colleges and universities.

By any measure, American higher education is the envy of the world. As Stephen Graubard, editor of Daedalus, said recently, the colleges and universities of this country have shown "a remarkable capacity for growth, innovation, invention and renovation." But, he warns, "No one would have made that claim in 1939 . . . and one cannot be certain that such a claim will still be made in 2039."

For we cannot today take for granted that the quality of higher education we have now will last forever. Far from it.

American colleges and universities are facing formidable obstacles: inadequate Federal student aid, a looming shortage of facility, decline of the physical infrastructure that supports scholarship and research, a continued drop in graduate school enrollments, and too little emphasis on the study of foreign languages and cultures and generally, on the liberal arts.

INVEST IN EDUCATED MEN AND WOMEN

My message is simple and straightforward: If the American republic is to survive, indeed, to flourish in the new world of the 21st century, we must be prepared to invest—and invest more, and more wisely—in educated men and women—and in the school, colleges and universities that produce them.

So to the members of the All-USA College Academic Teams I extend my warmest congratulations and best wishes for the future.

And I leave you with a message delivered over 30 years ago to another group of college students by a young United States Senator from Massachusetts.

The Senator was John F. Kennedy, and he exhorted his audience to, in his words, "offer . . . to the critical problems of society . . . the benefit of the talents which society has helped to develop in you."

"I ask you to decide," continued Kennedy, "as Goethe put it, whether you will be an anvil—or a hammer. The question is . . . whether you are to give to the world in which you were reared and educated the broadest possible benefits of that education."

My wish for you today is that each of you will continue to be a hammer and give to the world in which you were educated the broad benefits of your education.

AIRLINE DEREGULATION: PORTRAIT OF A TROUBLED INDUSTRY

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I rise today to share with my colleagues a superb five-part series of articles on airline deregulation which appeared recently in the Charleston News and Courier. The reporter, Larry Eichel, presents a sobering portrait of our air transportation system. Fares are on the rise, in fact rising faster than the overall cost of living during the last 2 years. Service has become erratic, with canceled and overbooked flights all too common. And, of course, safety is a major concern. I have chaired numerous hearings in recent years examining allegations that competitive pressures have caused airlines to cut corners. The most recent example of this is the continued operation of a number of aging aircraft far in excess of their intended lifespan. These are all issues that must be addressed by Congress during the year that lies ahead.

Mr. Eichel argues that there are a number of drawbacks to reregulation of the airline industry. Certainly, there is not a consensus in this body to return to the pre-1978 days of the Civil Aeronautics Board and comprehensive regulation of every fare and route.

By the same token, there is no question in this Senator's mind that the Federal Government must play a more constructive and assertive role in ensuring the safety, reliability, and affordability of airline travel in this country. We have a responsibility not just to passengers flying between New York and Los Angeles, but to the many millions of air travelers in small and medium-sized communities throughout the country.

Let me note that, last year, Secretary of Transportation Sam Skinner initiated a review of the competitive situation in today's airline industry, and his conclusions are due out any day now. We look forward to his recommendations for action. Certainly, I believe that strong action is required. Indeed, the time may be fast approaching when Congress must reexamine the wisdom of wholesale deregulation in this critical industry.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the five articles from The News and Courier be printed in the RECORD at this point. Thank you, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEREGULATION FAILING TO DELIVER ON PROMISES

(By Larry Eichel)

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—Eleven years ago, Congress deregulated the airlines, with the promise of lower fares and better service through enhanced competition.

(For a time, deregulation worked just the way its champions had predicted it would. New airlines popped up all over the countryside, airfares declined, and air travel mushroomed.

(But today, nearly all of the upstart, low-fare carriers are gone, along with some long-established ones—more than 200 casualties. Their assets have been redistributed by bankruptcy courts or gobbled up in a wave of merger mania.

(A five-part series beginning today and continuing in The News and Courier will examine deregulation and how it went awry.)

One recent Friday evening, David Brown boarded United Airlines flight 103, non-stop service from Philadelphia to San Francisco. So did Andy Skibo, Don Siegrist, Brad Weaver and Judith Benson.

David Brown sat in coach. So did the others.

He dined on California lasagana and beef roulade. The others did, too.

But there was one major difference between David Brown and his fellow passengers.

David Brown paid $586 for his seat.

Andy Skibo paid $483.

Don Siegrist paid $358.

Brad Weaver paid $229.

And Judith Benson, one row in front of Brown and just across the aisle, paid $124.

"It's an amazing thing," said Brown, a sales representative for a California wine company, shaking his head. "The mysteries of airline pricing are unbelievable."

This array of prices, one of the most wide-ranging in all of American life, is the direct result of an experiment launched by Congress 11 years ago.

The experiment was called airline deregulation.

And like so much that has happened in the airline industry since, this was not what the framers had in mind.

The idea was that there would be more airlines. In fact, today there are fewer.

The theory was that there would be more, competition. In a lot of places, there is less.

The expectation was that the airlines would compete primarily through ticket prices. For the most part, they don't.

The promise was that there would be better service. To many passengers, air travel has never been such a hassle.

"Disturbing trends have developed," said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who has introduced a bill designed to encourage more intense competition.

When it deregulated the airlines in October 1978, Congress decided that it would stop treating the industry as a public utility. No longer would the government tell the airines what routes they could fly and what they could charge, as it had for 40 years. The carriers, and the marketplace, would make those decisions.

For a time, deregulation worked just the way its champions had predicted it would. New airlines popped up all over the countryside, and consumers reaped the benefits of spirited competition. Airfares declined, service increased and the number of passengers mushroomed.

But those days are gone. Today nearly all the upstart, low-fare carriers have disappeared, along with some long-established ones—more than 200 casualties in all. Their assets have been redistributed by bankruptcy courts or gobbled up on a wave of merger mania that reached its zenith during the second term of President Ronald Reagan.

In their place are eight "megacarriers"—American, Delta, Northwest, Pan American, Texas Air (the parent company of Continental and Eastern), TWA, United and USAir.

And rising fares.

Average domestic airfares increased by 12 percent in the first half of 1989 compared with the first half of 1988, according to the Air Transport Association, the industry's trade group.

Fares have been rising faster than the cost of living for the last two years. While budget fares remain available to vacationers willing to lock in itineraries far in advance, business travelers have seen fares on their discounted tickets rise 47 percent since last fall, according to Runzheimer International, a travel management firm.

Those unregulated fares—along with the ongoing array of airline mergers, consolidations, takeovers and bankrupticies—have spurred debate about whether the time has come for the government to reassert some control.

"The issue is not deregulation or re-regulation," said Sen. John C. Danforth, R-Mo., who favors government intervention. "The issue is lack of competition. . . . This is a hot-button issue."

The trend in the airline industry is toward a marketplace controlled by the large and the few—a situation economists call an oligopoly.

In 1978, on the eve of deregulation, the eight largest airlines accounted for about 80 percent of the business on all U.S.-flag carriers. Now they control more than 93 percent.

Some of the advocates of deregulation originally believed that the old, established airlines would prove to be "dinosaurs," huge, slow-witted creatures that would fail to adapt to the new environment and rapidly become extinct.

A few of those dinosaurs did fade away. It took the others a while to adjust. But eventually they figured out how to turn their bigness into an asset by creating a new game in which only they could afford to play.

"The field was open, and they could make the rules," said Chris Witkowski, who heads the Washington-based Aviation Consumer Action Project. "There was no understanding (by government) of the marketing devices that would be developed and no will to keep them in check."

The major airlines poked gaping holes in the two theories on which airline deregulation was based.

One was that there was no inherent advantage in bigness, no "economies of scale," as the economists like to say. The other was that the mere threat of competition on a route was enough to keep fares in line.

The carriers destroyed those theories by creating an intricate web of marketing devices to attract and hold customers—regardless of ticket price. They were so radically different from anything that had come before that a whole new language had to be invented to describe them.

Frequent-flier programs. Computer reservations systems. Yield management. Code sharing. Commission overrides for travel agents. Hub-and-spoke route systems.

These marketing devices served two fundamental purposes: They deterred price competition among existing airlines, and they discouraged the formation of new ones.

Working in concert, they created a market in which there is little incentive for a traveler to patronize a new airline, little incentive for a travel agent to book the traveler on it and little incentive for an investor to finance the venture in the first place.

The airlines set up hub-and-spoke route systems to capture traffic, dominate regional markets and increase efficiency.

They locked up airport departure and arrival gates with 40-year leases, so that, in some cases, there literally was no room for competitors to come in.

They took nearly all the landing slots at the four airports where the government limits air traffic—Chicago's O'Hare, Washington National and New York's Kennedy and LaGuardia—thereby limiting the ability of any new entrant to set up a national route system.

And they bought up other airlines to eliminate competition and to achieve "critical mass"—the size and reach they needed to survive in the world they had created.

Northwest consumed Republic, its prime competitor in Minneapolis-St. Paul. TWA merged with Ozark, its rival in St. Louis.

Delta gobbled up Western. American absorbed Air Cal. USAir consumed Piedmont, Empire and Pacific Southwest. And Texas Air bought Eastern, Continental, People Express, New York Air and Frontier.

The big airlines used control over information, rooted in their computer systems, to help kill off the low-fare carriers that seemed to be the wave of the future in the early years of deregulations.

The demise of People Express, the best-known of the low-fare operators, was "a classic, textbook case of information technology as a competitive weapon," said Donald Burr, that airline's founder.

Information technology—the ability to assemble and manipulate complex combinations of fares and schedules—gave airlines the ability to target different ticket prices to different kinds of passengers with remarkable sophistication and precision.

Only the established airlines had enough money to put that technology to use. It allowed them to match the low fares of the upstart carriers on a selective basis, thereby taking away those carriers' reason for being.

"The computer is such a refined tool for pricing," said Louis A. Marckesano, who monitors the industry for Janney Montgomery Scott, the Philadelphia-based investment firm. "It allows a rifle-shot approach that can be deadly."

That approach continues to this day, allowing the major airlines to limit price competition among themselves—even on routes where they do go head-to-head.

Right now, four major carriers—American, Continental, Delta and United—operate 22 daily non-stop flights between Denver and Dallas-Fort Worth, a distance of 654 air miles. All four charge the identical coach fare, $300, one way.

Why doesn't one of the airlines drop its price and grab the business?

"If I know that if I cut my fare $20 today, you're going to cut yours $20 tomorrow, then it's stupid for me to do it," said Randall Malin, executive vice president for marketing at USAir. "Why would I do that?"

"We went through a period of bashing each other's heads in over fares," said James Lundy, a spokesman for Delta Airlines, looking back at the early years of deregulation. "It took us a while to learn how to compete."

Some airline executives—and some economists—argue that the airlines had no choice but to insulate themselves from unfettered price competition. They say that the product being sold, the airplane seat, has one distinctive trait that makes such competition inherently destructive.

That trait is its perishability. An unsold seat becomes worthless the moment the plane departs. At the same time, the actual cost of putting someone in that seat at the last minute is almost nothing—just the printing of a ticket and the providing of a meal.

So free market forces encourage carriers to engage in constant and brutal fare wars, matching each other fare cut for fare cut. And the carriers, in the interest of survival, had to make sure that didn't happen too often.

That is precisely what they have done.

In effect, the airlines have taken what used to be their basic product—single-plane, unrestricted coach service between two major cities—and made it their premium product, at a premium price.

Barbara R. Amster, vice president for pricing and yield management at American Airlines, says the full-coach seat is worth every penny.

"I charge you nothing if you don't use it," she said. "You are totally unpenalized. Can you get a car that way? Can you get a TV that way? Can you get a theater ticket that way? The answer is no."

Deregulation advocates point out that uniform pricing, which was enforced until 1978 by the Civil Aeronautics Board, is not the rule for other goods. A chocolate bar may sell for 25 cents at a supermarket, 50 cents at a convenience store and $1 at a movie theater.

"We've always been used to shopping for the chocolate bar," said James C. DeLong, Philadelphia's director of aviation. "Some of us are still not used to shopping for the best buys in transportation."

Airline deregulation has created some real benefits. Indeed, airline executives, government officials and many economists contend that, for all the grumbling, it has worked out extremely well.

Statistics indicate that deregulation has accomplished two of its prime missions—reducing average fares and getting more people into airplanes.

Consider fares. The average airline fare, when adjusted for inflation, is slightly lower today than in 1978. Before the big increases of the last two years, it was substantially lower.

That average fare is the combination of two pricing trends: sharp declines for travelers who can book their trips far in advance—declines that have made flying more accessible to people with modest incomes—and sharp increases for people who make their plans at the last minute.

Economists and lawmakers worry that, in the long run, diminishing competition will cause fares to rise more quickly.

Consider passengers. The number of people traveling on airlines has increased about 65 percent since 1978, fulfilling the promise that deregulation would make flying accessible to the masses. The number of flights up about 35 percent.

Polls indicate that about 73 percent of the adult population has flown at least once; before deregulation, the corresponding figure was 63 percent.

But critics of deregulation argue that much of the increase in air traffic would have happened anyway—that it is more a result of economic prosperity than of deregulation.

And there is another factor to consider—public dissatisfaction.

Survey after survey has found widespread public unhappiness with the experience of flying. Those surveys indicate that the people who travel the most are the ones who are most upset—about poor service, delayed flights, aging airplanes and higher fares.

Early last year, a Roper Poll found that public opinion, which was narrowly in favor of deregulation in the early 1980s, was now narrowly against it. And that was before the big fare increases.

PHILADELPHIA CHANGING FACE OF DEREGULATION

(By Larry Eichel)

PHILADELPHIA.—Airline deregulation has started to change course. And Philadelphia is the place.

Philadelphia International is the only airport in the country where the federal government, in effect, has mandated that there be competition among airlines.

It did so by paving the way for Chicago-based Midway Airlines to come here to compete with USAir, the dominant local carrier.

The process began in March when strike-bound Eastern Airlines announced that it had agreed to sell all its operations at Philadelphia International Airport—eight gates and two Canadian routes—to USAir. The deal would have assured a dominant position for USAir, which already operated more than 50 percent of the flights here.

Under the hands-off philosophy that prevailed in government for the last decade, the plan probably would have been approved. But this time, there were objections.

The first came from Pennsylvania Attorney General Ernest D. Preate Jr., who argued that the transaction would give USAir, which also had 86 percent of the market in Pittsburgh, a "near-monopoly" on air service, in the state.

The second and more significant one came from U.S. Secretary of Transportation Samuel K. Skinner, who said he worried that the sale of the gates would "significantly reduce the potential for new competition."

Ultimately, the Justice Department agreed with both of them and threatened to file an anti-trust suit to block the sale.

Eastern responded by backing out of the deal. Instead, Eastern sold its Philadelphia routes and gates—along with 16 DC-9 jets—to Midway, which had not been a major player here.

The benefits to consumers are apparent already.

Midway Airlines started new service to seven cities in Florida on Nov. 15 and is to begin operating a north-south hub with 36 daily flights this month.

The result, at least for now, is that the city is enjoying more frequent service on many Florida routes, particularly Philadelphia-Miami.

Six months ago, only USAir offered nonstop service to Miami, twice a day, with one-way fares in the $300 range. Now, five carriers offer 14 daily flights and fares have sunk as low as $79. And fares are dramatically lower wherever else USAir and Midway go head-to-head.

The question is whether the federal intervention that brought Midway here—a marked shift from the laissez-faire policy of the Reagan years—will be duplicated elsewhere and will benefit local consumers over the long haul.

Many industry analysts are openly skeptical about whether a small airline like Midway, the nation's 13th largest, can survive for long in a market already occupied by a mega-carrier like USAir.

"I think Midway is going to have a hard time," said Edward Starkman, airline analyst at the investment firm of Paine Webber. "They have no presence in the travel agencies. They have a poor frequent-flier program. If they go in relatively quietly and content themselves at first with carrying USAir's spillover, they could do fine. But if they get into a price war with USAir, they'll lose."

Until now, the frequency and variety of flights at Philadelphia International have not been what one would expect for the nation's fourth-largest metropolitan area, experts say.

According to data compiled by the Air Transport Association, Philadelphia ranks 28th among major metropolitan areas in terms of number of flights relative to the number of local passengers.

And Philadelphia ranks only 18th in terms of local passengers generated, behind such smaller cities as Denver; Houston; and Seattle, according to statistics compiled by TWA.

Industry analysts have two theories why this is so.

One has to do with location: Many of the prime destinations for Philadelphia travelers—New York; Washington; Baltimore; Harrisburg, Pa.; Atlantic City, N.J.—are nearby and readily accessible by train or by car.

The other is the availability of lower fares and more frequent service at two airports in the New York area—Newark in New Jersey for domestic flights, John F. Kennedy in Queens, N.Y., for international flights. Both are readily accessible to Philadelphia-area travelers.

Beyond that, the situation may be self-perpetuating.

FLYING HAS BECOME "NIGHTMARE" FOR TRAVELERS

(By Larry Eichel)

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—Eleven years ago, Congress deregulated the airlines with the promise of lower fares and better service through enhanced competition.

(For a time, deregulation worked just the way its champions had predicted it would. New airlines popped up all over the country, airfares declined and air travel mushroomed.

(But today, nearly all of the upstart, low-fare carriers are gone, along with some more long established ones—more than 200 casualties. Their assets have been redistributed by bankruptcy courts or gobbled up in a wave of merger mania.

(This the second installment of a five part series in The News and Courier examining deregulation and how it went awry.)

Anne McClusky flew from Cleveland to Manchester, N.H., in November 1988 to pick up her 87-year-old mother and take her back to Ohio for the Christmas season. Their return tickets called for them to take a USAir flight from Manchester to Pittsburgh, then connect with a flight to Cleveland after a four-hour layover.

But on the morning of their return, the women got a call from McClusky's husband, Donald, who said he would drive to Pittsburgh to pick them up, thus sparing them the four-hour wait and getting them home before dinner.

Delighted, the women went to the USAir counter at the Manchester airport. They told the ticket agent of their new plans and asked that their luggage be checked only as far as Pittsburgh.

Not so fast, said the agent. That'll be another $570.

The McClusky family had just run up against one of the facts of life under airline deregulation: a complex system with so many rules and stipulations that consumers find it all but incomprehensible.

That system has turned air travel into an experience that many travelers say has become less and less tolerable—with high fares, erratic service, cramped seats, overbooked flights and unreliable performance, in addition to all those unfathomable rules.

Many airline passengers have come to feel like pieces of baggage—that get tossed around and, sometimes, lost in the shuffle.

"It's a nightmare, an absolute nightmare," said Ken Flanders, an executive from Simi Valley, Calif., before boarding a flight recently at Philadelphia International Airport.

What happened to the McCluskys is a case in point, albeit an exceptional one. It is not every day that two people end up paying an extra $570 for seats they never sat in.

Anne McClusky thought the request she made at the ticket counter in Manchester was a simple and reasonable one. She and her mother, Marion Pearson, just wanted to discard a portion of the tickets for which they had already paid.

Can't do that, said the agent. These are tickets to Cleveland, good only for travel to Cleveland. And these are super-saver tickets—no changes allowed.

If the women wanted to go only as far as Pittsburg, the tickets would have to be reissued and upgraded to full coach. That would cost $570 more.

Unsure what to do next, McClusky went to a telephone to call her husband. Too late. He was already in his car, on his way to pick up the women.

Then she went back to the ticket counter with a question: What would happen if she and her mother used their super-saver tickets, got off in Pittsburg, let their baggage go on to Cleveland and picked up there?

According to Donald McClusky, this was the reply:

"(The ticket agent said they) would be 'blacklisted on the computer,' perhaps for life, from USAir economy fares and managed to imply that they'd be blacklisted from other airlines as well. At that, my mother-in-law burst into tears.

Reluctantly, the women paid the money. And got on the plane in Manchester. And got off in Pittsburgh. And didn't fly to Cleveland.

"This whole thing doesn't make any sense to me," Donald McClusky said in an interview. "We said to the airline, 'We want to use less of your service, use less of your fuel, cause less wear and tear on your plane,' and they said, 'Thanks, we'll charge you a lot more money and be unpleasant about it, too."

He recounted the incident in an angy, sarcastic letter to USAir President Edwin I. Colodny, suggesting the ticket agents in Manchester must have thought they were dealing with a "pair of rouges disguised as a middle-aged woman and her elderly mother."

"Do you have a reward system for making old ladies miserable?" McClusky asked Colodny. "are there extra points if it's Christmas?

At the end of December, McClusky got his answers. They came in a letter from Harry M. Roth, USAir's director of consumer affairs at the time.

No $570 check was enclosed. No apology was offered. Instead, there was an explanation of the fare structure and of the airline's need to protect it.

Wrote Roth: "Although I understand, and appreciate, the reasons you found it easier to pick up your wife and her mother at their connecting point in Pittsburgh, it was not the air transportation that they had reserved or paid for."

McClusky was not content to leave it at that. He complained to his congressman, who complained to the Department of Transportation, which complained to USAir. Last month, nearly a year after the episode, he received an apology—plus a voucher good for a round-trip ticket to New Hampshire.

Judging the quality of air travel is a subjective business. Roughly 450 million people flew on U.S. airlines last year, and only 21,000 were frustrated enough to file complaints with the transportation department. The level of complaints this year is even lower, the government says.

But talk to frequent travelers and a different picture emerges. They don't complain to the government, they say, because they don't see any point in it. They expect so little that it takes a true disaster to stir them to action.

Airline executives respond that some decline in the quality of service in the cabin and at the counter was an inevitable by-product of deregulation, which converted the airliner into a true vehicle of mass transportation.

They say that much passenger discontent is the result of congestion-related delays, for which government's failure to build more airports and runways is largely to blame.

They contend that passengers tend to overstate both how bad things are now and how good they were in the old days. And they say conditions are getting better.

But they concede there is room for improvement in several areas.

Service. Flying was once an experience to be savored. On long flights in the days before deregulation, a traveler could expect a gourmet meal, works of art on cabin walls and maybe even a piano bar.

Now, in many cases, flying is an ordeal to be endured.

Frederic V. Malek, the new president of Northwest Airlines, recently described Northwest as "a good airline but a second-rate service company.

One big reason for the deterioration in service is that planes are more crowded. Before deregulation, a typical flight was little more than half full; now the average "load factor" is 64 percent.

Several airlines, including Northwest, are studying the possibility of reconfiguring the coach section to allow passengers an expanded range of activities and service. Other carriers are setting aside more seats for "business class," delivering enhanced service to business people paying full fare.

Routes. There are more ways than ever to get there from here. But a lot of them require you to go someplace else first.

Virtually all the carriers have adopted the hub-and-spoke route structure. They funnel most of their traffic through one or two hub airports, thereby enabling passengers to make one-stop connections between numerous cities.

But the result has been a cutback in direct service between many pairs of smaller communities—a source of constant complaint in the rural United States—more congestion at the hubs and more complicated travel arrangements across the board.

According to a study commissioned by the Air Transport Association, the percentage of people taking connecting flights rather than direct flights to reach their destinations has grown from 32 percent in 1982 to 39 percent in 1988.

Delays. They have become a fact of life.

More than 20 percent of all flights arrive late, which the government defines as more than 15 minutes behind schedule, according to federal statistics.

That happens even though delays stemming from mechanical problems are not counted—and even though airline schedules have been adjusted in recent years to build in extra time for congestion-related delays. Most of the adjustments have been made since 1987, when the Department of Transportation began to make public its on-time performance reports on the various carriers.

On current airline schedules, for instance, the flight time from Houston to Philadelphia is listed at 3 hours and 5 minutes. In 1978, before deregulation, the schedules listed a flight time of 2 hours and 36 minutes.

This is not entirely the fault of the airlines. Nor is it entirely the fault of deregulation.

There has not been a single new airport built from the ground up since Dallas-Fort Worth opened in 1974. And both the staffing and technology in the air traffic control system are widely considered to be inadequate.

The airlines are not responsible for building airports or for running control towers.

"There are real problems here, but deregulation by itself is not to blame." said economist Clifford Winston of Washington's Brookings Institution, a private think tank. "It's the interaction of deregulation with mismanaged public policy. . . ."

For the consumer, the most dramatic change brought by deregulation involves a basic act—buying a ticket.

The purchase of an airplane ticket used to be one of the simplest transactions in all of American life. Now it is one of the most complicated.

There are subtle forces at work behind the scenes that influence the traveler's final decision, often without the consumer even being aware of them.

Before October 1978, you called an airline—any airline—and asked if the carrier flew where you wanted to go. You knew, without even asking, that you were getting the best price because it was the only price. Uniform pricing was the rule, a rule enforced by the Civil Aeronautics Board.

Since fares were tied to mileage, it always cost about as much to fly from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh (267 miles) as from Cincinnati to Chicago (265 miles).

If the airline did not fly to the destination you wanted, or if it flew at the wrong time of the day, you could ask what other airline provided service. And you'd get an answer. The sales representatives would even tell you when the other airline's flights left—and often issue the ticket for you.

Nothing like that happens today.

Sensing the complexity that confronts them, most ticket buyers begein the transaction by calling a travel agent; 80 percent of all tickets are issued by agencies.

The outcome of that conversation between agent and customer is influenced by several sets of incentives—some working on the agent, some on the customer—that can often give an advantage to the dominant airline in a particular market.

It begins the moment the travel agent turns on the computer to find out which flights might meet a client's needs.

In virtually every travel agency in the country, the computer is part of a reservation system owned by an airline. Few passengers know that, and few travel agents tell them.

Yet the reservations system in the travel agency helps determine which airline the customer travels on. Study after study has shown that the airline owning the system gets a significantly enhanced share of that agency's ticketing business.

By fostering fierce brand loyalty, frequent-flier programs help shield airlines from competition. They ensure that, all other factors being equal—and sometimes even if they're not—the traveler will use the airline on which he has accumulated the most credits.

"This isn't a system that's good for the American public," said Ted Harris an airline consultant who is one of deregulation's most outspoken critics: "It's a system that's good for the airlines."

RESERVATIONS SYSTEMS CAN CUT COMPETITION

(By Larry Eichel)

At a gathering of financial analysts last year, Robert L. Crandall, the chief executive officer of American Airlines, was asked a hypothetical question:

If the government forced him to give up either his airline, the nation's largest, or his computer reservation system, which would he choose?

He said he would have to think about it.

That answer, or non-answer, underlines just how vital computers have become.

They are, in a sense, the key to the way the major carriers have managed to limit competition—both in determining how many seats to offer at what fares and in selling those seats to the public.

Consider this fact: Nearly all the nation's travel agencies use an airline-owned computer system—there are five of them—to make reservations and issue tickets.

And the two largest airlines, American and United, are far more dominant in the computer reservations business than in the air.

American's SABRE system, which is number one, and United's Apollo, which is number two, account for roughly two-thirds of the market.

Computer reservations systems (CRS) make money for their owners by collecting a booking fee, usually $1.85 per flight, from the airline on which the flight is booked.

What that means is that American and United are siphoning tens of millions of dollars from their rivals each year.

Analysts from the congressional General Accounting Office estimated last fall that profit margins for SABRE and Apollo were in the 50 to 100 percent range. American Airlines officials say profits have run about 25 percent.

"The major CRS systems are at the root of the unreasonable industry concentration, excessive market domination and monopoly power that we face today," said Edward R. Beauvais, chairman of America West Airlines, which does not have one. "And they will lead to conditions that will allow these large carriers to increase prices, reduce services and diminish competition. They are massive, massive weapons."

A CRS is a technological marvel. In fact, American Airlines claims that SABRE—which stands for Semi-Automatic Business Research Environment—is "the world's largest privately owned, real-time computer network."

It has to be. On any given day, there can be as many as 45 million different fares and as many as 600,000 fare changes for a CRS to track.

The system gives travel agents across the country access to a full range of schedules and fares. It also provides the owner-airline with up-to-the-minute reports of what is happening in the marketplace—no small consideration in a world where information is money.

Generating the information that winds up in the system—how many seats are available in what fare classifications—is the work of another set of computers, those devoted to what airline executives call "yield management."

The purpose of yield management, a term that did not exist before deregulation, is to get the most money out of each flight. The method is to strike the right balance between low-fare passengers and high-fare passengers, between those who buy tickets three months ahead and those who buy at the last minute.

Each major carrier has roughly 100 people who practice yield management full time. Their task is to adjust supply to meet demand, hour by hour, flight by flight. By pressing a few keys on their computer terminals, they can make a fare appear one day, disappear the next and reappear the day after, depending on the pace of sales.

"Every flight is unique by time of day, day of week, time of year and type of market—leisure, business or mixed," said Barbara R. Amster, vice president of pricing and yield management at American. "We are talking massive, massive data bases that have to be updated constantly."

The cost of being even a little bit wrong—in either direction—can be very high.

If the computer "protects" 25 seats for late sale at full fare and only 20 get sold, that means five seats go empty—five seats that might have produced some revenue if they had been made available for sale at discount.

But if 30 full-fare customers show up, the airline winds up with an overbooked plane, some very angry customers and the knowledge that it may have to turn away five passengers willing to pay top dollar—and carry five discount passengers in their places.

"The worst thing a yield manager can imagine is a flight that sells out too early," said Tulinda Deegan Larsen, vice president of Airline Economics, an airline consulting firm. "That means that revenue was not maximized."

All this helps explain why an ordinary passenger never knows how much he or she will have to pay.

Only the computer knows.

HUB SYSTEM GIVES AIRLINES POWER OVER MARKET

ST. LOUIS.—At 9 o'clock each morning, it looks like all the commercial jets in the world belong to Trans World Airlines and all of them have converged on the St. Louis airport.

Thirty-some jets of varying size and type—each painted white with red stripes, each bearing the TWA logo—stand motionless at their gates, noses in, tails out, engines off.

All else is movement and noise.

On the tarmac, workers unload baggage holds and toss suitcases onto conveyor belts and into baggage trucks. Jet engines are checked, tanks fueled and galleys loaded with food and drink. Dozens of vans and small trucks scurry from plane to plane, their drivers delivering packages, parts, tools and guidance.

In a glass booth atop the main concourse, TWA operations manager Vic Caputo and seven lieutenants—armed with telephones, walkie-talkies, computers and their own eyes—monitor this intricate dance of people and machines.

Meanwhile, inside the terminal, 4,000 travelers are playing commercial aviation's version of musical chairs.

They have flown in from 30 points east of St. Louis—Philadelphia and Pittsburgh; Newark, N.J., and New York; Tampa Fla., and Toledo, Ohio. And most of them are headed for destinations west of St. Louis—Los Angeles and Little Rock, Ark.; San Francisco and San Antonio, Calif.; Denver and Des Moines, Iowa.

In determined silence, they stride from their planes into the tumult of the airport concourse. They stare up at television monitors, looking for the gate assignment of their next flight. Then they stroll, trek or sprint through the halls, depending on how much time they have and how far they have to go.

By 10 o'clock, all the TWA jets and all the TWA passengers are in the air, headed west.

The airport is empty—no planes, no people. And it stays that way for a few minutes, until the next group of planes begins to drop out of the sky.

This is a hub airport in operation.

When it works as planned, it is a logistical marvel to behold. But this system is at the heart of the debate over airline deregulation.

The issue: Hub dominance.

Since 1978, when Congress deregulated the industry, nearly every major carrier has adopted a route structure called hub-and-spoke. It is a system in which an airline offers one-stop service between hundreds of pairs of cities—the spokes—by funneling passengers through a central airport—the hub.

The problem is that once a carrier establishes a hub and becomes dominant at that airport, the airline can use its economic power to keep others out and to create a virtual lock on the local business. And there is considerable evidence to indicate that airlines convert such dominance into higher fares for local passengers.

Which explains why some travelers who live in the St. Louis area feel they have become the hostages of TWA. At Lambert-St. Louis International Airport, TWA has 82 percent of the business.

"I resent it bitterly, and it's more than an issue of money with me," said Hal Kroeger, who runs a paper products distribution business from offices in suburban Florissant, Mo., and is so frustrated that he is considering having his company lease a private jet.

"In the last three years, we've seen less courtesy, less reliability and much higher fares. And the service is as bad as the fares. The impact of having a monopoly is so deep."

It is not a situation limited to St. Louis and TWA.

USAir has 92 percent of the business in Charlotte, N.C., and 86 percent in Pittsburgh. Northwest Airlines has 84 percent at Memphis, Tenn., and 79 percent in Minneapolis-St. Paul.

American Airlines has 70 percent in Nashville, Tenn., and Raleigh-Durham, N.C. And Delta has roughly three-fourths of the market in Cincinnati, Salt Lake City and, most significantly, Atlanta, the largest hub in the South.

Three other hub airports—Dallas-Fort Worth, Denver and Chicago O'Hare—are controlled by two carriers apiece. American and Delta share 89 percent in Dallas-Fort Worth; United and Continental have 85 percent in Denver; American and United have 80 percent at O'Hare.

At several others—including Detroit Metro; Houston Intercontinental; Chicago Midway; Newark; Syracuse, N.Y.; Dayton, Ohio; and Baltimore-Washington—one airline controls more than half the traffic.

"For a significant and increasing minority of passengers who depend on hub airports, the benefits of deregulation are eroding," said Kenneth Mead of the General Accounting Office, the congressional watchdog. "This is cause for alarm."

No one is more alarmed than a St. Louis resident named John C. Danforth, a member of the U.S. Senate who is the ranking Republican on the Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee, which oversees the airline industry.

"The problem is concentration at individual airports causing lack of competition," Danforth said. "When you're up to 82 percent, as we are (with TWA) in St. Louis, how much worse can it get? I'd say that's intolerable."

Despite such sentiments, hub airports do offer some real advantages. One is convenience. Since each hub is a focal point for a carrier's entire route system, travelers living in the area have access to more non-stop flights to more places than they would have otherwise.

Another is the boost to the local economy, both from having thousands of airline employees in town and from being so accessible to the rest of the country. No city that has a hub airport has ever asked an airline to take its hub someplace else.

"Call up Louisville, call up Columbus (Ohio), call up any city that doesn't have a hub," said Randall Malin, executive vice president of USAir. "They'd give anything to have one. Communities want better service, because service means access and access means business."

But there is a price to be paid. And it comes right out of the pockets of the local travelers, particularly the local business travelers, who have no choice but to use the airport.

Study after study has shown that passengers beginning or ending their trips at most of the nation's 35 hub airports pay higher fares.

In the spring, the General Accounting Office studied 15 airports dominated by one carrier and reported to Congress that those airports had 27 percent higher fares than airports of similar size that did not have a dominant airline.

The carriers' trade group, the Air Transport Association (ATA), responded with a study of its own, based on 1988 data, concluding that hub fares were indeed higher—but only by an average of 4 percent. In that survey, fares at the Philadelphia hub came out 15 percent higher than at comparable non-hub airports.

Airline executives argue that the difference is attributable largely to the abundance of short-haul, non-stop flights available at hub airports. Under the current fare structure, non-stop flights almost always cost more than one-stops, regardless of whether hub airports are involved.

"(People served by hubs are) getting something exceptional," said ATA President Robert J. Aaronson, "and we're acknowledging they're paying a little more for it. . . . Anecdotal evidence aside, the hub-and-spoke system has evolved into a highly competitive national transportation system which provides enormous benefits to the American public."

But in St. Louis, some frequent travelers tell a different story.

"I used to be able to fly to New York for $180 round-trip," said Alice Burgess, whose St. Louis company makes medical videos. "Now it's $592, and that's with a seven-day advance purchase and a 25 percent penalty for changes.

TWA officials contend, though, that St. Louis is not oppressed. If it were, they say, the airline would have a full-fledged consumer revolt on its hands. And it doesn't.

"The general reaction from the business community is 'Thank God that we've got a hub!'" said TWA spokesman Don Morrison. "The area gets more non-stop flights than it would otherwise. We're one of the top five employers in the city of St. Louis, the number two employer in the state of Missouri. That wouldn't be the case if we were hubbing out of Toledo."

Barbara R. Amster, vice president for pricing and yield management at American Airlines, argues that fares at most hub airports are not out of line and that they are held in check by competition.

"It's hard to abuse the customer," she said. "He's got too many other options. If St. Louis passengers don't want to fly nonstop on TWA to Los Angeles, they can fly (one-stop) to Los Angeles over our (American) hub in Dallas-Fort Worth or United's hub in Denver or Braniff's in Kansas City."

Indeed, the almost universal adoption of the hub-and-spoke system has resulted in more choices on long-distance routes—although most of them require a stop and a change of plane.

But if you live in a hub city, your reasonable options often begin and end with the dominant airline. In St. Louis, that is TWA.

TWA has a monopoly on non-stop service between St. Louis and 54 destinations, among them all three airports serving metropolitan New York; all three airports serving the Washington, D.C., area; Los Angeles; San Francisco; Philadelphia; Boston; Hartford-Springfield, Conn.; Orlando, Fla.; Miami; Tampa-St. Petersburg, Fla.; New Orleans; Phoenix, Ariz.; Las Vegas, Nev.; San Diego and Seattle. Before deregulation, TWA had non-stop monopolies on only six of those routes.

It is not just that TWA now accounts for 82 percent of the total St. Louis market and 62 percent of the passengers for whom St. Louis is origin or destination. Flights that pass through or begin or end in St. Louis account for nearly 80 percent of the airline's entire domestic system.

The other major airlines offer St. Louis residents what amounts to token service; they operate a few flights a day between Lambert International and their own hubs. In fact, the number two carrier in St. Louis is Southwest Airlines—a lowfare carrier that offers no food other than peanuts, no assigned seats, no connections with other, bigger carriers and no service east of Detroit.

The hub-and-spoke concept existed before deregulation. Delta and Eastern have operated southern hubs in Atlanta for years, and USAir has long had a significant connecting operation in Pittsburgh.

But the coming of deregulation in 1978 gave airlines the freedom to enter and leave routes as they pleased. Airlines moved to reinforce their positions in markets where they were strong and to abandon markets where they were weak. And hub-and-spoke became the rule.

For TWA or any other airline, the hub-and-spoke system offers several obvious economic advantages.

Each carrier gains efficiency by concentrating the bulk of its personnel and its operations in a handful of cities. By bringing each flight through the hub, the airline is able to offer more service to more destinations than under the old point-to-point system.

And the more spokes the airline adds, the more options it can provide to passengers. And the more traffic it captures. Flights that otherwise were as much as 70 percent empty (and thus soon to be eliminated) suddenly were 70 percent full. The reason: Nearly every flight leaving any spoke city can take a passenger virtually anywhere, through the hub.

The system also helps make sure that a passenger, once on the airline, stays on that airline for the duration of the trip, said Robert Joedicke, airline analyst for Shearson Lehman Hutton.

Before deregulation, 16 percent of all passengers who changed planes on a trip had to change airlines as well. Now, the corresponding figure is 2 percent.

Very rarely do airlines invade hubs already dominated by other carriers. They prefer, instead, to expand their own hubs or create new ones at airports they can dominate.

"The risk of trying to come in and compete at another carrier's hub is enormous," said Shane, the assistant transportation secretary.

That explains why American Airlines set up medium-sized hubs two years ago in Nashville and Raleigh-Durham, rather than in Atlanta—Delta's stronghold.

DEREGULATION COMPOUNDS SAFETY PROBLEMS

(By Larry Eichel)

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—Eleven years ago, Congress deregulated the airlines with the promise of lower fares and better service through enhanced competition.

(For a time, deregulation worked just the way its champions had predicted it would. New airlines popped up all over the country, airfares declined and air travel mushroomed.

(But, today, nearly all of the upstart, lowfare carriers are gone, along with some more long-established ones—more than 200 casualties. Their assets have been redistributed by bankruptcy courts or gobbled up in a wave of merger mania.

(This the the fourth installment of a five-part series in The News and Courier examining deregulation and how it went awry.)

Your flight is delayed at the gate for no apparent reason; the weather is clear, all the passengers have their seat belts fastened and everything seems to be working fine.

Then the plane is held up again on the tarmac; the pilot offers some vague explanation about waiting for clearance from air traffic control, even though lots of other planes seem to be coming and going.

You are paying the price now charged for safety in the deregulated skies.

The growth in air travel and the failure of government to respond adequately have put severe strains on the nation's air travel system. And the system's way of easing those strains is to make airplanes sit on the ground and wait.

Ever since Congress enacted airline deregulation in 1978, lawmakers have repeated these words as if they were a mantra: "Congress didn't deregulate safety." Indeed, the Airline Deregulation Act eliminated the Civil Aeronautics Board, the agency that passed judgment on routes and fares, not the Federal Aviation Administration, which concerns itself with operations and maintenance.

But deregulation has had an impact on safety:

Aging aircraft have become a major concern.

Experience levels of pilots and mechanics have dropped, and a future shortage of pilots is likely.

Pressure on the air traffic control system has increased.

Even the FAA has come under criticism as too ponderous and inflexible a bureaucracy to adequately monitor a dynamic and growing industry.

By itself deregulation did not create any of these problems. But it contributed to the magnitude of all of them.

Yet, while the system has been strained, it has not broken.

The safety record of the major airlines has been better in the decade since deregulation than in the prior decade. Fewer people have died in airplane crashes in the 1980s than in the 1970s, even though the number of people flying has increased by two-thirds.

"The system is bulging at the seams, but the record shows that it is the safest in the world and has never been safer," said Secretary of Transportation Samuel K. Skinner. "I can't see where deregulation has had any impact on safety."

But Arnold Barnett and Mary K. Higgins of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology studied all the safety numbers and reached a slightly different conclusion, one that meshes with the opinions of several independent experts.

"One can plausibly contend that safety has improved despite deregulation," they concluded, "and would have improved more in the absence of the policy."

In other words, they said, deregulation may have worked against safety but not enough to outweigh a lot of other factors.

Among those factors are advances in technology, improved knowledge of what causes accidents, increased caution by controllers, the expertise of aviation professionals, the vigilance of the FAA and the relatively new concept of "flow control"—the practice of making planes stay on the ground until controllers can assure them a reasonably clear path to their destinations.

Like other aspects of the airline industry under deregulation, safety often comes down to a matter of dollars and cents. "I think we've reached a point where airlines that make higher profits are safer airlines," said John Galipault, director of the nonprofit Aviation Safety Institute.

So the higher fares and increased profits of the last two years should mean that more money is now available for new planes and quality maintenance—at least for American, Delta, Northwest, United and USAir, the five most profitable major carriers.

But other airlines—Pan American, Eastern, TWA and Continental——are not doing well. And one of the healthier carriers, Northwest, has just taken on several billion dollars in added debt as the result of a leveraged buyout. United, the object of an unsuccessful takeover attempt earlier this year, may yet be headed down a similar path.

Air safety relies on four major components—the airplanes, the people who fly and maintain them, the air traffic system and the people who regulate and operate it. All four components have been substantially affected by deregulation.

THE AIRPLANES

Deregulation, with its emphasis on the bottom line, gave the airlines every economic reason to keep old airplanes in the sky as long as possible. And unlike the situation in previous decades, there were no major technological advances that made the planes obsolete.

Those two forces combined to produce the problem of aging aircraft. It is unprecedented. Never before in the history of commercial aviation have airline executives had to worry about a generation of planes wearing out.

The average age of the nation's fleet of nearly 4,000 jetliners is about 12 years. According to industry data, more than 31 percent of those jets are more than 20 years old.

According to the Air Transport Association, U.S. carriers have firm orders for at least 975 planes valued at $40 billion and options for 1,207 others, all to be delivered over the next five years.

Concern about the bottom line contributed to carriers' decisions to delay placing large orders for new aircraft until last year. Two factors have caused them to overcome their reluctance.

One was the realization that the days of low profits and cutthroat competition were gone. The other was the ripping open of an Aloha Airlines Boeing 737 in mid-flight on April 28, 1988, which made the aging aircraft issued impossible to ignore.

Since the Aloha accident, the FAA, the carriers and aircraft manufacturers have been trying to figure out what to do—amid congressional proposals that jetliners be subjected to a mandatory retirement age.

This year, the FAA, working in consultation with the industry, has established new policy directives for maintaining older jetliners built by Boeing and McDonnell Douglas.

According to the FAA, maintenance accounted for 12.5 percent of expenses in 1978 for all airlines, the last year before deregulation, but fell to 9.2 percent in 1982. That percentage was back up to 11.5 percent in 1988.

THE PERSONNEL

No element is more important in guaranteeing safety than the skill of the men and women in the cockpit and the hangars.

Deregulation has increased the demand for commercial airline pilots at a time when the armed forces, the traditional source of such pilots, are producing fewer and fewer.

The result has been that the average experience level of pilots at major airlines has fallen in recent years from 4,500 flying hours to 3,600, according to the Future Aviation Professionals of America, an Atlanta-based group that tries to encourage young people to select careers in aviation.

The situation figures to get worse. About 25 percent of the current crop of commercial pilots will reach the mandatory retirement age of 60 by 1997, even as the airlines continue to expand. FAA chief James B. Busey, a retired admiral, has said that his inclination is to keep the retirement age in place.

In August, the Air Transportation Association reported that the carriers already were working with 4,000 fewer mechanics than they would like.

John H. Enders, president of the nonprofit Flight Safety Foundation, based in suburban Washington, also points with concern to the erosion and, in some cases, the outright disappearance of airline engineering departments, which used to watch for recurring technical problems within each carrier's fleet. Now that function has shifted largely to the manufacturers.

THE AIR TRAFFIC SYSTEM

In the view of the carriers, there is only one truly major problem threatening the future of commercial aviation. That is the lack of sufficient capacity to meet growing demand.

The capacity problem has several aspects.

One is the lack of new airports; none has been built from scratch in the United States since Dallas-Fort Worth opened in 1974, four years before deregulation.

Another is the inadequacy of the computer equipment now being used by air traffic controllers in airport towers and regional centers. Much of that equipment is based on the technology of the 1960's.

In September, FAA chief Busey called on Congress to double the agency's spending on the purchase and installation of computers and other new equipment—as called for in the National Airspace System plan. The plan is years behind schedule.

New computers would enhance safety by making it easier for controllers to track planes. And they would increase capacity by making it possible for planes to fly closer together.

The urgency of such improvements was underlined by a study completed in July by the General Accounting Office, the investigating arm of Congress. According to the GAO, equipment failures have caused information critical to preventing midair collisions to vanish from controllers' screens for a few moments at 27 of the 57 Terminal Radar Approach Control Centers that handle traffic at the nation's largest airports.

The number of controllers also remains a problem, as it has since President Ronald Reagan fired thousands of members of the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization after the union went on strike eight years ago.

THE REGULATORS

Nearly everyone in the aviation community respects the professionalism and commitment of the people who work for the FAA. But almost no one thinks the agency as a whole is as effective as it could be.

The basic complaints about the FAA are that its rule-making processes are too combersome, its bureaucracy too decentralized, its regulations needlessly complex, its inspection programs misdirected and its leadership lacking in continuity. Since 1958, the average stay in office for an FAA administrator has been less than three years.

Some members of Congress contend that the only way to give the FAA the flexibility and the clout it needs is to make it less political, by taking it out from under the Department of Transportation and giving it an administrator with a long, fixed term.

Legislation calling for an autonomous FAA is opposed by Transportation Secretary Skinner and by FAA chief Busey. It is being pushed by Sen. Wendell H. Ford, D-Ky., chairman of the Commerce aviation subcommittee, who was angered by the fact that the FAA did not have a permanent administrator for the first six months of the Bush administration.

The airlines know there is a link between safety and economic success. Given a choice, people will not fly on an airline they consider unsafe.

Beyond that, airline executives worry that if safety deteriorates, congressional opponents of deregulation will use that as justification for putting the regulatory clamps back on the industry.

"I don't think there'd be a successful move (in Congress) toward reregulation of the industry unless you could show a remarkable deterioration in safety attributable directly to deregulation," said James E. Landry, senior vice president of the Air Transport Association, the industry's trade association.

"And we would never allow it to get to that point."

CONGRESS PONDERS ROLE WITH AIRLINES

(By Larry Eichel)

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—Eleven years ago, Congress deregulated the airlines with the promise of lower fares and better service through enhanced competition.

(For a time, deregulation worked just the way its champions had predicted it would. New airlines popped up all over the country, airfares declined and air travel mushroomed.)

(But today, nearly all of the upstart, low-fare carriers are gone, along with some more long-established ones—more than 200 casualties. Their assets have been redistributed by bankruptcy courts or gobbled up in a wave of merger mania.

(This is the final installment of a five-part series in The News and Courier examining deregulation and how it went awry.)

WASHINGTON.—Members of Congress, who are among the nation's most frequent and most frustrated fliers, take great relish in angrily recounting their personal tales of high fares, discourteous service, lost luggage and missed connections.

Many of them mutter in agreement when they hear from such outspoken critics of deregulations as Donald L. Pevsner.

"(The airlines—can screw the public every day, every flight and get away with it in the absence of meaningful competition," said Pevsner, former general counsel of Air Florida. "But meaningful competition can never again exist, absent some sort of profound reregulation."

Such sentiments have prompted Congress to seriously consider a more active role for government in monitoring the business of the airlines. The question is how active.

"I am a born-again regulator," said Sen. Ernest F. Hollings, D-S.C., chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee.

During the congressional session that ended Nov. 27, the House passed legislation that would prohibit any change in the ownership of an airline without the prior approval of the Transportation Department. But the bill never came to a vote in the Senate, after the Bush administration threatened a presidential veto.

Beyond that, two senior Republican members of the Senate Commerce aviation subcommittee, John C. Danforth of Missouri and John McCain of Arizona, introduced legislation aimed at enhancing competition.

Their bill would outlaw several industry practices widely considered anti-competitive and, most significantly, force the airlines out of the lucrative computer reservations business.

And two Democratic senators, Howard Metzenbaum of Ohio and Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, have introduced the Airline Reregulation Act, calling on the government to get back into the business of regulating fares and routes.

"I don't know if complete re-regulation is the answer," Metzenbaum said. "But I do know it's time we owned up to the fact that airline deregulation was a mistake. Unless Congress steps in, airlines will continue to pilot the industry toward disaster."

Only a few voices are advocating a return to anything like the old days, when the Civil Aeronautics Board was the sole arbiter of where the airlines flew and how much they charged.

In that sense, re-regulation is not a live option.

"I do not want to get back into the fare-setting business," said Secretary of Transportation Samuel K. Skinner, who has set up a task force to recommend how to encourage competition and has demonstrated a far more activist approach to airline issues than his predecessors.

"I see no reason to do it, and I see a lot of good reasons not to do it," Skinner said in an interview. "On the other hand, I do not have a total hands-off policy. I do not think the secretary of transportation can sit idly by and watch concentration and monopolies grow."

For legislators and policy-makers, the very complexity of the deregulated airline marketplace makes any federal intervention a truly daunting prospect. If there is one guarantee, it is that whatever action they take will demonstrate the power of the law of unintended consequences—as enactment of deregulation itself did in 1978.

Many industry analysts and airline executives argue that the current situation, in which eight national mega-carriers account for 93 percent of the business, is no great cause for alarm.

As the airline industry becomes ever more global in nature, the nation will be better served by a handful of large airlines than by dozens of smaller ones, they say.

But members of Congress are concerned about the way hub airports have become fiefdoms of individual carriers.

They are concerned about the growing power of the mega-carriers and by predictions that even a modest recession in the next few years could cause the nation's eight major airlines to dwindle to six—American, Delta, Northwest, Texas Air, United and USAir.

Both TWA Chairman Carl C. Icahn and Pan American chief Thomas G. Plaskett have said that their airlines must get bigger, merge, be taken over or die.

"The strong carriers are very strong, and weak ones are still weak, and the gap between the strong and the weak is widening," said Edmund S. Greenslet, an industry analyst based in Jacksonville, Fla.

Members of Congress are worried, too, about the possible threats to safety and competition when a mega-carrier is bought and sold in a highly leveraged transaction, as Northwest was earlier this year and as United and American almost were.

Those fears are based on the billions of dollars in new debt imposed on an airline in a leveraged buyout. In a recession, a debt-laden airline is more likely to go bankrupt or be forced into a merger, financial experts say.

"Can we afford to risk even one bankruptcy among the eight major carriers?" Rep. Peter A. DeFazio, D-Ore., asked his colleagues on the House aviation subcommittee. "Should an airline be allowed to postpone modernization in order to finance its debt? Make no mistake, many of the people and groups now interested in acquiring airlines are not industry experts. They are the quick-buck artists of Wall Street."

For their part, the airlines say deregulation has been a success; that a heightened government presence, however well-intentioned, would do more harm than good; and that the free market should be allowed to continue to do its work.

They point out that airline profits remain modest by the standards of American industry—and that profits have been slipping in the second half of this year.

"The present situation is healthy and competitive," said Robert J. Aaronson, president of the Air Transport Association, the industry trade group. "Our view is that if something is not broken, you don't fix it."

But that is not the view on Capitol Hill.

"I don't think there's debate any more on whether there is a problem," said Kenneth Mead, who monitors the airlines for the General Accounting Office, the congressional watchdog agency. "The debate is what do we do about it. And if nothing is done, I would see further concentration and, in turn, higher fares."

Here are the options Congress and the Transportation Department are considering:

Making it easier for airlines to gain access to gates and other basic facilities at airports.

The big issue, in the minds of many, is the degree to which hub airports are dominated by single airlines. And it is hard for an airline even to contemplate competing at a dominated hub if it can't get enough gates.

Many gates are tied up for years on long-term, exclusive-use leases. And so-called "majority-in-interest" clauses often give the dominant airline at a lub veto power over any airport expansion that might make room for new service.

In testimony, on Capitol Hill in September, the GAO's Mead pointed out that Congress could nullify such arrangements, most of which were signed before the coming of deregulation, or ban them in the future.

Figuring out a better way to allocate slots at the nation's four most congested airports.

At Washington National, Chicago O'Hare, New York LaGuardia and New York Kennedy airports, a commercial airliner cannot land or take off without government permission—a slot. There are only so many slots. And all of them are in the semi-permanent custody of the airlines now serving those airports.

Current federal policy, called the "buy-sell" rule, allows those airlines to buy and sell slots as if they owned them, which they don't.

So if a new airline wants to enter one of those airports, it must buy a slot from the airlines that have them. Often that price is in the millions—even though the government originally issued the slots for free. More often, though, slots are not for sale.

This situation, even though it exists at only four airports, has an anti-competitive impact throughout the country: An entrepreneur cannot expect to build a significant airline without the ability to take passengers to New York, Washington and Chicago.

The airport operators, as well as executives of the smaller airlines, want a better way for slots to be distributed. Under the Danforth-McCain bill, the Department of Transportation would take back all the slots and auction them off—making certain that some be reserved for new entrants.

Changing the ownership of computerized reservation systems (CRS).

There are five such systems, all of them owned by individual airlines or small groups of airlines. Travel agents rely on computerized reservation systems almost exclusively. And American and United, the nation's two biggest carriers, own the two biggest systems.

The Danforth-McCain proposal to force the airlines out of the computer reservations business entirely is backed by some economists and by some of the airlines that either do not have their own systems or have small ones.

Outlawing frequent-flyer programs.

The programs, in which passengers accumulate credits toward free trips by using a single airline, have succeeded beyond the carriers' wildest dreams.

They have generated brand loyalty and given customers a reason, other than price and service, to choose a particular airline. They have created legions of mileage junkies. They have dampened price competition, economists say, and worked to reinforce the power of dominant airlines in hub cities.

Congress could move to outlaw the popular programs, although no lawmaker has been daring enough to put such a proposal in the form of legislation. Some lawmakers wish the Internal Revenue Service would take them off the hook by deciding to tax as income any frequent-flier benefits earned by travelers not paying for their own tickets.

Limiting airline takeovers.

When Congress reconvenes in January, it will take up various bills limiting airline takeovers.

Behind the proposals is the fear that such buyouts leave major airlines burdened with so much debt that airline managers become more concerned with generating cash to make interest payments than with serving the public.

The congressional viewpoint is that the Transportation Department needs explicit authority to review transaction before they happen—the department reviewed the Northwest takeover after the fact. And it needs additional enforcement measures so that officials need not use the only one they have now—the authority to ground the airline altogether.

Grounding an airline to force it to restructure its financing is like "using a howitzer to go deer hunting," said Rep. James L. Oberstar, D-Minn, chairman of the House Public Works subcommittee on aviation.

But the Bush administration has threatened to veto any such bill and Skinner has said that the Northwest episode demonstrated that this current authority is appropriate.

In any event, the climate for future mergers between two major airlines now appears relatively hostile; analysts doubt that the government would approve any major deal.

That is because the authority over airline mergers has passed to the Justice Department from the Transportation Department which approved nearly every merger the airlines proposed during the first 10 years of deregulation.

Assistant Attorney General James F. Rill, who heads the Antitrust Division of the Justice Department, has pledged to take a hard look at airline mergers and to "seek to prevent mergers between airlines with overlapping hubs."

In a speech last month, Rill noted that the Justice Department could effectively block a deal just by announcing its opposition. It has done so twice this year—stopping the proposed merger between the computer reservations systems owned by American Airlines and Delta Airlines and the proposed sale of Eastern's gates at Philadelphia to USAir.

Encouraging competition between foreign and domestic airlines.

Current federal policy bans foreign carriers from picking up passengers in one American city and depositing them in another, even if the carrier flies that route. For example, British Airways flies a Pittsburgh-Washington-London route but is not allowed to carry passengers just between Pittsburgh and Washington.

Giving foreign carriers the right to do that—known as cabotage—is popular among free-market economists but not among politicians and airline executives.

With Europe moving toward its own version of airline deregulation in 1992, there is the chance that international carriers might be granted limited rights to carry passengers on domestic routes in exchange for U.S.-flag carriers being given similar rights in Europe.

Setting ceilings on certain types of fares.

In all but its final version, the Airline Deregulation Act of 1978 had a provision allowing the Civil Aeronautics Board to set fare ceilings on any route on which one carrier controlled more than 90 percent of the traffic. Giving such power now to the Department of Transportation is one possibility being discussed.

Economist Alfred E. Kahn, former chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board and the father of deregulation, says that he cannot "in principle" rule out such ceilings. Pevsner proposes a ceiling on all full coach fares, based on a mileage formula.

In his bill, Metzenbaum proposes a five-member, independent Aviation Policy Board to set fares and routes.

Paul Stephen Dempsey, a transportation law expert at the University of Denver, would establish a National Transportation Commission with power to impose fare ceilings and floors—to set up a "zone of reasonableness."

"In time," Dempsey said, "a consensus will develop that deregulation has been a failure. . . . Sooner or later, we will re-regulate the airline."

But many industry analysts believe that Congress will do so such thing.

"Maybe the best the Federal government can do is to promote competition at every opportunity," said Patrick V. Murphy, a deputy assistant secretary of transportation. "Secretary Skinner has already done more in promote competition since he took office than was done in the last few years."

The thrust toward even the most modest sort of airline re-regulation is dampered by the fear that any attempt to fix one problem might create another problem.

The lower fares paid by vacationers might not exist without the higher fares paid by business travelers. The hub airports, with their bounty of non-stop flights, could not exist without the spoke airports, which get service mainly through the hubs.

"I think a few regulations here and there would be good, "said Michael E. Levine, a former executive with New York Air who now runs the management school at Yale University. "But I worry about saying something like that to a Congress that . . . is likely to go for a quick fix that would do more harm than good."

Kahn has a similar outlook.

"If there were any simple solutions," said Kahn, "we would long ago have found them."

SOUTHERN BELL: A CORPORATE HERO IN HUGO'S WAKE

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, 5 months ago, Hurricane Hugo smashed into South Carolina, leaving a path of destruction like nothing seen in my State since the Civil War. In previous floor statements, I have saluted the many heroes to emerge in the wake of Hugo: Courageous individuals, public servants who rose magnificently to the occasion, corporations that pitched in with donations and private relief initiatives. Today I rise to pay special tribute to Southern Bell for its remarkable performance during and after that fateful evening of September 21-22. Simply put, for the men and women of Southern Bell, this was their finest hour.

Perhaps the most eloquent tribute to Southern Bell is the fact that approximately 90 percent of its customers in the impacted areas never lost service. Only two of the telephone network's central offices—at Edisto Beach and Seabrook Island, both on the barrier islands east of Charleston—were disabled by the hurricane.

This incredible resiliency within the network was the result of years of foresight and modernization by Southern Bell, specifically the company's aggressive efforts to bury more than three quarters of its cable, as well as its efforts to switch from copper wiring to fiber optics. In the days after Hugo hit, more than one instance was noted of a public phone booth, submerged in sand and debris, but with its receiver still giving a dial tone, loud and clear. Now that truly is a system that takes a lick'n and keeps on tick'n.

Even so, there was tremendous destruction to BellSouth's above-ground equipment—with thousands of downed cables and telephone poles. To repair this damage and restore full service, the company mobilized a small army of engineers and technicians, bringing to South Carolina some 600 specialists from Florida, Georgia, and elsewhere to supplement the local personnel. It was an impressive, round-the-clock effort that restored virtually 100 percent service in relatively short order.

Mr. President, I extend my congratulations and gratitude to all the men and women of Southern Bell for the outstanding job they did throughout this crisis period. They worked long hours, and performed with exceptional skill and professionalism. They served the people of South Carolina superbly at our time of greatest need.

FEDERAL TAX AMNESTY ACT

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, yesterday IRS Commissioner Fred Goldberg testified before the House Ways and Means oversight subcommittee on a serious and continuing problem confronting his agency—and more importantly, confronting our Nation. During a decade in which the Federal deficit has grown to appalling levels, compliance with our Federal tax laws has actually declined.

The IRS estimates the tax gap—that is, the difference between what is owed to the Federal Government and what is actually collected—to be $87 billion. $87 billion of uncollected taxes is nothing less than scandalous. It exacerbates our mounting budget deficit, as well as increases the burdens upon all honest taxpaying citizens.

It is an alarming fact that almost 9 percent of the taxes legally owed and due the Government are not being collected. In 1983, the tax gap was estimated to be $24 billion. By 1992, lost revenue to the Government could reach as much as $114 billion.

Mr. President, every year billions and billions of dollars are lost to our tax collection system. Part of the problem lies within the Internal Revenue Service itself. Its procedures are outdated and inefficient. At the same time, its enforcement staff has dwindled to a point where increased staff is urgently needed. Contained in the President's budget for fiscal year 1991 is an increase in funding for IRS enforcement. This is an important first step. Such a step, however, speaks only to future compliance. Merely increasing IRS collection efforts alone will not recover the vast majority of these outstanding delinquent balances.

Since I first came to the Senate, I have repeatedly argued for, and introduced legislation to institute, a Federal tax amnesty program. It is my belief that such a program is an essential step to recover the lost revenues from prior years.

A number of States—including my State of Illinois, Massachusetts, New York, Connecticut, Kansas, Alabama, Texas, Missouri, Minnesota, North Dakota, New Mexico, Arizona, California, Idaho, and Maryland—have enacted tax amnesty programs. In my State alone, approximately $150 million was collected—far more than the Illinois Department of Revenue originally estimated. These were revenues that Illinois would otherwise not have been able to collect. The success of these State tax amnesty programs has demonstrated the potential of this idea at the national level.

It is true that Federal tax collection efforts are more sophisticated than those of the States. The Federal Government, however, is losing billions of tax dollars—$87 billion this year. Of this $87 billion, underreported income—that is, overstated deductions and credits, as well as unreported income—represents roughly $40 billion. The largest portion of this unreported income is from sole proprietorships, informal supplier income, and capital gains.

Mr. President, the results of State amnesty programs have been impressive. These programs have demonstrated that many individuals and companies will come forward if they can pay their back taxes, and not be prosecuted. The State programs have also revealed that amnesty programs have enabled the States to collect significant amounts of currently uncollectable revenue with a minimal amount of resources. Over 130,000 delinquent taxpayers came forward in California—Illinois collected approximately $150 million—and over $72 million was collected in Massachusetts.

The State programs were not giveaways: they did not reward tax cheaters. Rather, the State programs were balanced. Following the amnesty period, compliance efforts and penalties for noncompliance were increased. However, the State programs have resulted in placing additional taxpayers back on the rolls. These are additional revenues that otherwise would not have been collected.

At the Federal level, revenues from a tax amnesty/enforcement package can be utilized to help reduce our budget deficit. At the same time, these revenues can help preserve high-priority Federal programs that are currently facing drastic cuts or elimination.

The bill that I reintroduced during the first session of this Congress, S. 387, would establish a tax amnesty-tough enforcement package. This legislation would institute a 6-month amnesty period, to begin on July 1 after the bill is enacted. The amnesty period would cover all tax years through 1987 still subject to collection by the IRS. The bill would include amnesty from criminal and civil penalties, and from 50 percent of any interest penalty owed. All Federal taxes would be covered by the amnesty, not just the Federal income tax. The tough enforcement side of the package would increase all tax-related civil and criminal penalties by 50 percent. In addition, the bill would authorize such funds as are necessary to add 3,000 additional revenue agents to the IRS.

As we battle headlong to reduce our uncontrollable budget deficit, debating over whether to cut essential programs or impose unwanted taxes on our citizens, we should take advantage of the benefits that a tax amnesty program yields. I urge my colleagues to carefully examine the amnesty concept.

TERRY ANDERSON

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to inform my colleagues that today marks the 1,803d day that Terry Anderson has been held in captivity in Beirut.

POSTHUMOUS CITIZENSHIP FOR ACTIVE DUTY SERVICE ACT

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am delighted that the Senate has passed and sent to the President the Posthumous Citizenship for Active Duty Service Act.

Although this legislation provides for the granting of posthumous citizenship to any alien killed in hostilities while serving in the Armed Forces of the United States, the bill in my view is a special tribute to Cpl. Ivan Perez of Central Falls, RI.

Corporal Perez served with the United States Army during the recent hostilities in Panama. Just after midnight, on December 20, 1989, Cpl. Ivan Perez was shot and killed during the U.S. takeover of Gen. Manuel Noriega's headquarters.

Corporal Perez was a U.S. soldier but he was not a U.S. citizen at the time of his death. The road that any immigrant follows toward U.S. citizenship is full of twists and turns. Tragically, this road came to an abrupt end for Corporal Perez. There is currently no law that recognizes the unique contribution made to our Nation by individuals such as Corporal Perez. There is no law that enables a noncitizen resident of the United States, who is killed under fire as a member of the U.S. Armed Forces, to be recognized as a U.S. citizen.

The Posthumous Citizenship for Active Duty Service Act provides such a system. Under this act, a simple procedure will be created to grant citizenship to any alien or noncitizen national who dies while serving honorably while on active duty in the U.S. Armed Forces.

The Posthumous Citizenship for Active Duty Service Act was introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman BRIAN DONNELLY on January 3, 1989. The House of Representatives subsequently passed the Posthumous Citizenship for Active Duty Service Act on November 13, 1989. Congressman DONNELLY introduced the bill because one of his constituents, Cpl. Wladyslaw Staniszewski of Brockton, MA, was killed in the Vietnam war. Corporal Staniszewski was not a U.S. citizen, but deserved citizenship. A private bill was introduced to make him a citizen, but it took 3 years before this very simple bill was passed. Clearly, there had to be a better way to honor the contribution of individuals like Corporal Staniszewski and Corporal Perez. That way is provided by the Posthumous Citizenship for Active Duty Service Act.

Under this act, the Attorney General will now be allowed to grant posthumous citizenship to a noncitizen resident of the United States who is killed while on active duty service with this Nation's Armed Forces. The request for citizenship can be made by the next of kin. This new process for citizenship will negate any need for the cumbersome and time consuming process of introducing a private bill. The Posthumous Citizenship for Active Duty Service Act will apply to any individual killed in service to this country since World War I.

This bill was introduced before the hostilities in Panama took place, but it was the death of Corporal Perez that proved to be the catalyst behind rapid Senate passage of this bill. After learning that this legislation was pending in the Senate Judiciary Committee, I spoke to Judiciary Committee chairman, Senator JOSEPH BIDEN and Immigration and Refugee Affairs Subcommittee chairman, Senator EDWARD KENNEDY, and told them about Corporal Perez and the need to move quickly to create a mechanism allowing our Nation to bestow citizenship promptly on Corporal Perez and others like him. I also informed the respective senior minority members of the full committee and the subcommittee, Senator STROM THURMOND and Senator ALAN SIMPSON, about Corporal Perez. I wish to thank all of these Senators, especially Senators BIDEN and KENNEDY, for moving this bill through the Judiciary Committee and to the floor of the Senate in such rapid fashion.

All that remains for this legislation to become the law of the land is the signature of the President and I am confident that will be forthcoming. We are all saddened by the deaths of young men and women in the service of our country. I hope this legislation, recognizing the debt of gratitude we owe to those who gave their lives even though not citizens—men like the two young corporals, one from Massachusetts, the other from Rhode Island, one in Vietnam, the other in Panama—is of some comfort to their families.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. KERREY. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. KERREY pertaining to the introduction of S. 2155 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

AMERICA'S OUTBACK

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, on October 9, 1989, Newsweek published an article entitled, "America's Outback." Under the subheading, "Amid scarcity and broken dreams, six Western States mark 100 hard years at the end of the cracked whip," this article takes a look at North Dakota, Wyoming, Montana, Idaho, Washington, and my home State of South Dakota as they reach their centennials.

Many South Dakotans were disturbed by national misunderstanding of the portrait this article painted of their State and region—and understandably so. Our region faces problems and challenges as it always has, but the view that we will fail to meet those challenges ignores our 100-year history and underestimates our peoples' strength of character and will.

"America's Outback" concludes that, "As this moment of celebration, the promise of 1989 is far bleaker than the promise of 1889. The breathtaking Centennial West may return to what it was: Vast silent spaces where wild game stare at the passing horseman." Those of us who were born and raised in the Centennial West, those who live there now, and those who live in other parts of the country but visit the Black Hills or Yellowstone during their vacations have confidence in the region's future. However, regrettably, many Americans simply do not realize what a beautiful and unique place the Centennial West is, and how much it has to offer.

Perhaps no one knows South Dakota better than the youth of our State who represent its future. Shortly after "America's Outback" appeared, Cari Skogberg, a high school sophomore from Belle Fourche, a rural community of 4,500 people in western South Dakota, drafted a response to Newsweek. In a letter to me, Cari wrote, "I take great pride in the State and area of the country that I live in. I feel very sorry for [those] who don't see the real things that make life beautiful."

I share Cari Skogberg's feelings for our home, and I would like to share her eloquent statement with my colleagues.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Cari Skogberg's response to Newsweek be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the response was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BELLE FOURCHE, SD,
November 19, 1989.

DEAR NEWSWEEK MAGAZINE: I was shocked and appalled to read your article entitled "America's Outback" (Oct. 9, 1989 issue.) I could hardly believe that you would print such an erroneous article? Perhaps all that "city smog" has clouded your brain, but I'd like to give you some facts—the true ones!!

First of all, the midwest is one of the most beautiful areas of our country. We have clean, fresh air, wide open spaces, an natural beauty that surpasses that of any other area. How many New Yorkers have ever watched a golden South Dakota sunrise or have awakened to the sound of meadowlarks singing outside their window? How many have watched the birth of a newborn calf or experienced the serenity of listening to a field of wheat hum in the wind? These are the priceless things that no amount of money could ever replace. I feel sorry for those who have never experienced these things, and for those who think that life is made up of offices and paperwork.

Another point to think about is that less than 2% of our country's population produces food for the other 98%. Where does that 2% come from? "America's Outback!" We are the backbone of this country. It is our hard-working farmers and farmwives that dedicate their lives to feeding you! I think that deserves a lot of credit!!

Last of all, take a good look at the people of the midwest. Are they really the sad, sorry people that you made them out to be? Not at all! The people of our region are hard-working, good natured men and women who know the meaning of the word work! They aren't afraid to lift a finger to get something done. They care about their neighbor, be it a friend or stranger, and are always willing to lend a hand. People like this aren't always easy to find. I'm proud to say that it is in the midwest that they make their homes.

Perhaps our part of the country doesn't have lots of factories and smokestacks, but what we've got here is far more important. We have lives filled with beauty and love. We know that those around us care about us, and help to make us the warm and caring people that we are!! And most of all, we have the pride that we contribute something to our country which helps to make it the superpower it is today!! Things aren't always easy for us, but that hasn't knocked us down. We just keep on going, trying to make this a better world for everyone!!

No, we aren't America's outback!! We are a region that puts America in the forefront. I hope that your readers see through the misconceptions and realize how wonderful the midwest really is!!!

I sincerely hope that your other articles don't distort the real picture the way this one did. America deserves to know how rich it is with the wealth of regions like ours.

Sincerely,

CARI L. SKOGBERG,
High School Sophomore.

JOE CLARK: POLITICAL GIANT

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I rise today to remember one of our boldest, most tenacious, and most dedicated colleagues—Joseph S. Clark, who died last month in Philadelphia after a distinguished career in public service.

I served just 2 years in the Senate with Joe Clark—from 1967 to 1969—but in those 2 short years I got a crash course in courage and independence. He was a Senator who feared nobody and who acted on conviction rather than a party label or political favor. He was the kind of Senator we like to remember—and the kind we like to emulate.

In his tenure as mayor of Philadelphia and a two-term Senator from Pennsylvania, Joe Clark had a brilliant political career as a government reformer, as a civil rights leader, and as a "New Frontier" legislator. But it was as a leader for peace and an opponent of the war in Vietnam that I best remember him.

Joe Clark was a leader, a reformer, a visionary. Whether it was voting against funds to implement the war in Vietnam or fighting to control the sale and distribution of guns, he was willing to take unpopular positions even if it meant high political risk. In these early days of 1990 as we watch the cold war breathe its last and we seek to take advantage of a rare opportunity to end the arms race, we are reminded of leaders like Joe Clark who dared—years ago—to challenge the world to new thinking.

Joe came to Congress in large part, I believe, to work for peace and for a vision of the world in which the rule of law would dominate petty rivalries of nations and in which the United States would lead the world in taking steps toward general and complete disarmament under enforceable world law. Unfortunately, when he got here, he found, much to his dismay, that he was expected to rubberstamp the cold war view of the world. Denied committee assignments which kept him from these issues, and not amenable to accepting a fate imposed by others, he founded his own organization of Members of the Senate and House committed to a different vision of the world. So began Members of Congress for Peace through law, now known as the Arms Control and Foreign Policy Caucus.

I am proud to have chaired the group which Joe founded—and watched it expand from a group of a few Senators and House Members meeting over lunch to discuss efforts at disarmament and world law, to its present configuration of over 140 Members of Congress with a professional staff, which provides a wealth of legislative research, issue discussions and policy initiatives on topics relating from the nuclear arms race to our relations with the developing world. Most important, as chairman of the caucus in both the 92d Congress and the 100th Congress, I can attest to its ongoing commitment to the goals that Joe Clark envisioned, and can pledge that we will continue to work for those goals in the future.

On behalf of my colleagues who served with him, and on behalf of the Members who continue to promote the ideals he stood for, I send condolences to Joe's wife, Iris, and to his family.

Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the obituaries from the Philadelphia Inquirer and the New York Times. They capture the spirit of a fine man and a truly distinguished Senator.

There being no objection, the obituaries were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Jan. 15, 1990]

POLITICAL GIANT JOSEPH CLARK DEAD AT 88

(By Steve Neal, Burr Van Atta, and Julia Cass)

Joseph Sill Clark, 88, one of the most effective champions of political reform in Philadelphia's history, died Friday at his home in Chestnut Hill.

His wife, Iris Clark, said the former mayor and U.S. senator died peacefully in bed. She was with him, she said, along with his stepdaughter and a nurse.

An urbane Chestnut Hill patrician, Mr. Clark in 1951 became Philadelphia's first Democratic mayor since 1884. His election, coupled with a reformed City Charter, ended the corruption-ridden Republican organization's 67-year control of City Hall.

Five years later, in 1956, Mr. Clark was elected to the first of two Senate terms. There, he gained distinction as an intelligent and forceful civil rights advocate, one of the earliest critics of the Vietnam War and a proponent of congressional reform.

"Joe Clark, Richardson Dilworth and Walter Phillips were the three musketeers of the reform movement. They were responsible for the halycon days of 1952 to 1960, when the quality of municipal government in Philadelphia was so high," said Thacher Longstreth, the Republican city councilman and a longtime friend.

Mayor Goode called Mr. Clark "an outstanding mayor of the city at a very crucial time. He was an outstanding U.S. senator and public servant. No public servant has done more for the city than Joe Clark."

Mr. Clark was a Social Register liberal whose political philosophy was a compound of noblesse oblige and New Deal idealism, a combination that inclined him to view his principal duty as that of righting wrongs.

Mr. Clark was at first dismissed as a lightweight by old-line politicians, partly because of his private-school background and partly because of his slight build. But he demonstrated an inner toughness that won their respect, if not their approval.

Mr. Clark's tenacity was never more evident than at his May 7, 1951 confrontation with the barons of Philadelphia's Democratic party—Albert M. Greenfield, John B. Kelly, Matthew McCloskey, Frank J. Myers and James Finnegan—at the old Ritz-Carlton Hotel.

Their message was blunt Mr. Clark, though he had earlier been promised support for the mayoral election, should step aside in favor of Richardson Dilworth, his longtime ally in reform politics. Dilworth, they pointed out, was older, more experienced and better known.

Dilworth, they told him, was the man they wanted to run for mayor. Warned earlier of their strategy, Mr. Clark cut them short.

"Before we proceed any further," he began, "I think I ought to tell you that less than an hour ago, I released to the press a statement of my irrevocable decision to run for mayor. I intend to run whether or not I have your backing—even if my only supporters are me and my wife. I think our discussion ought to proceed on that basis."

Clearly outfinessed, the aging party leaders finally gave Mr. Clark their support.

Mr. Clark's wealth and formidable vote-pulling powers enabled him to remain free of all political organizations throughout his career. To the distress of some of his admirers, he was not only independent, but he was intolerant of party leaders and their machinery, treating them with an imperious disdain.

In The Challenge of Urban Reform, a comprehensive history of the Clark mayoral years, professor Kirk F. Petshek wrote, "Clark's most important shortcoming was his failure to appreciate politicians and his tendency to act as if they were beneath him. Too often he made it clear that he thought ward leaders unimportant."

Mr. Clark's dislike of backroom political bosses was effective in his anti-organization campaigning in the city, but it rebounded against him in his unsuccessful 1968 re-election campaign for the U.S. Senate. In Western Pennsylvania, many party leaders withheld their support. Montgomery County Republican Richard S. Schweiker, who ran as a liberal, defeated him with ease.

Mr. Clark, the son of Joseph Sill Clark Sr. and Kate Richardson Avery Clark, was born to "the good life." The elder Clark was a wealthy lawyer and a celebrated tennis champion.

"My father had a wonderful life," Mr. Clark once recalled. "He loved to shoot birds and drink port wine, and he was utterly untroubled by social conscience."

Mr. Clark attended the proper schools, Chestnut Hill Academy and the Middlesex School in Massachusetts, where he played football and baseball, and was graduated in 1919 as class valedictorian.

He went on to study at Harvard, specializing in government, history and economics. He was a member of the baseball and track teams, made Phi Beta Kappa and was graduated magna cum laude in 1923.

Three years later, Mr. Clark was graduated from the University of Pennsylvania's Law School, where he was editor of the Law Review. After passing the bar exams, in December 1926 Mr. Clark joined his father's law firm.

And in 1926, Mr. Clark made his first political race—as a progressive candidate for Republican committeeman. He lost.

He broke the Clark family's Republican tradition in 1928 by voting for Democratic presidential candidate Alfred E. Smith, and shortly afterward changed his registration to Democratic. He joined Dilworth, another fledging lawyer and Democratic convert, in organizing the Warriors, a reform Democratic club.

"We couldn't get anything done as Republicans," Mr. Clark explained.

"Dick [Dilworth] and I were anomalies in city politics," Mr. Clark said. "We both came from well-to-do families and we knew each other as kids. I like to say that we learned the American way of life together on the beaches of Southampton, Long Island, before World War I."

Dilworth managed Mr. Clark's campaign for City Council in 1934. And in 1936, Mr. Clark managed Dilworth's bid for the state Senate. Both races were unsuccessful and both men turned to their legal practices.

At the age of 39, Mr. Clark entered the Army Air Corps as a captain in August 1941. Mr. Clark first served in the Army Air Corps Planning Headquarters in Washington. When America entered the war, he was transferred to the China-Burma-India theater of operations as Gen. George E. Stratemeyer's senior administrator officer.

Of his war service, Mr. Clark often joked. "I fought most of the war on the grass tennis courts of Delhi." But he was awarded the Bronze Star, the Legion of Merit and the Military Order of the British Empire.

Upon his return to Philadelphia, Mr. Clark planned another venture in politics with Dilworth. The two men were convicted that they had to do something about city government, where the description given by Lincoln Steffens in 1904 still held: "Other American cities, no matter how bad their condition may be, point with scorn to Philadelphia as worse—the "worst governed city in the country.' "

In 1947, Mr. Clark managed Dilworth's campaign for mayor. The Democratic organization, surprisingly, endorsed Dilworth. Though Republican incumbent Bernard Samuel defeated Dilworth by 93,000 votes, the campaign marked the beginning of the end for the GOP.

Dilworth waged a vigorous street-corner campaign, arguing that corruption governed City Hall and loudly naming names. Enough people listened that a grand jury was convened and scandals were investigated. A group of civil-minded businessmen organized the Greater Philadelphia Movement.

Then, in 1949, Mr. Clark ran for city controller and Dilworth for treasurer. Both were elected by 100,000-vote pluralities.

As controller, Mr. Clark had two years to probe Republican scandals and report his findings to the public. With relish, he exposed bribes, assorted forms of graft, and inefficiencies in the Samuel administration. Many were impeached and indicted. Nine committed suicide.

When he became a mayoral candidate in 1951, Mr. Clark began his campaign on what his investigation had revealed. Using a broom as his symbol, Mr. Clark pledged to sweep out corruption.

His Republican opponent was the Rev. Daniel A. Poling, a well-known Protestant clergyman, whom party leaders hoped would dilute the corruption issue.

But Mr. Clark was elected by 124,700 votes as the Democrats also swept 15 to 17 seats on the new City Council. The new charter eliminated the legislature's control over city government and gave the mayor significant administrative, legislative and investigative powers.

Mr. Clark's election gave Philadelphians a sense of belief in their government that they had not held in years. He replaced the city's spoils system with a Civil Service system. He hired lawyers, business executives and academicians for the top positions.

Mr. Clark said that a mayor can attract such talent "only if he holds a high conception of the purpose of political leadership. . . . A good political leader must have the ability to look ahead for the best way to the ideal future of his city and try to lead his community a short distance in the right direction."

Mr. Clark said, years later, that his major achievements as mayor were "the reform of the police—taking them out of politics" and "the opening of a career service in city government to blacks."

Mr. Clark's strict enforcement of Civil Service regulations, which made it possible for thousands of black people to find jobs for the first time in city government, won him strong support in the black community.

So did his willingness to challenge racist traditions. He took several black friends to lunch at the Philadelphia Cricket Club near his home in Chestnut Hill—the first time in the club's 100-year history that blacks had been guests there.

"If I hadn't been a life member by my father the day I was born, they probably would have asked for my resignation," Mr. Clark observed.

Mr. Clark pushed through a $20 million tax increase and put the city on a pay-as-you-go fiscal system. This enabled him to increase and improve many city services neglected by previous administrations.

City planners from New York, Chicago, Detroit, New Haven and Newark studied the Clark administration to see if its succeessful programs could be transplanted in other cities.

Although Mr. Clark was a masterful administrator, one who knew how to use all the proper channels, some of his top staff members found him difficult to work for.

"He was a hard taskmaster," a former aide said. "He was abrupt and aggressive, if opposed. Those reporting to him or suggesting new ideas had better know the answers if they wanted to keep his respect."

His impatience sometimes caused him problems even among his admirers.

Dilworth, an ex-Marine with an explosive temper, sometimes found Mr. Clark "difficult," and the men came close to a public break in 1955, over who would run for mayor.

While Mr. Clark, in his first news conference was mayor, had said he would run for the Senate in 1956 rather than seek re-election, he later changed his mind. And he didn't tell Dilworth.

Dilworth learned of Mr. Clark's intention to run again with the mayor announced he would run for a second term because, he said, Democratic Chairman William J. Green was trying to "gut the City Charter."

Dilworth felt betrayed by the announcement. He reminded the mayor that Mr. Clark had promised to support him for mayor.

Using much the same tactic as Clark in 1951, Dilworth resolved the problem head on. Tired of waiting for a decision, Dilworth said he simply "announced my candidacy and he supported me." Dilworth was elected mayor in a landslide.

As Mr. Clark's term ended, he began maneuvering for the Senate race. He won the Democratic nomination over the opposition of Philadelphia's Democratic organization.

Mr. Clark was taking on Sen. James H. Duff, a former Republican governor and one of the state's most succcessful politicians. Duff was a close friend of President Eisenhower and expected to benefit heavily from his coattails.

Mr. Clark defeated Duff by a razor-thin margin—17,000 votes—but he ran 600,000 votes ahead of the national ticket, and some columnists began to promote Mr. Clark as a potential Democratic presidential candidate in 1960.

A Clark-for-President drive never really got under way, and Mr. Clark later said that he understood himself. "I could not stand up under the pressures of the presidency. The Senate was my true ambition."

Shortly after his election to the Senate, Mr. Clark asked Sen. Hubert Humphrey of Minnesota how to succeed in Washington. "Don't let your ideology embitter your personal relationships," Humphrey counseled. "It won't, if you behave with maturity."

But Mr. Clark soon clashed with Senate Majority Leader Lyndon B. Johnson. He was offended by Johnson's habit of pawing at the man he was talking to, by his salty language and by his hard-sell tactics.

And, more importantly he believed Johnson was not pushing for much of the social legislation written into the national Democratic platform—housing, federal aid to education and civil rights.

Mr. Clark prepared a detailed policy statement, based on the 1956 Democratic platform, and asked Johnson to consider its adoption as Senate Democratic policy. Johnson ignored him.

Mr. Clark antagonized John F. Kennedy during the 1960 campaign when he charged that Kennedy was neglecting his Senate responsibilities.

"I think the Senate will pass a minimum wage increase if we can just get Sonny Boy [Kennedy] back from the cricks and hollers long enough to report it out of his committee," Mr. Clark said on the eve of the West Virginia primary. The remarks was widely quoted in Republican campaign literature.

He further alienated Kennedy by threatening to support Stevenson during the hotly contested national convention that year.

But once Kennedy was nominated, Mr. Clark campaigned hard for him. His work for Kennedy did not go unnoticed. He was sounded out for cabinet position, but indicated a preference to remain in the Senate. Kennedy later asked Mr. Clark to draw up a civil rights program for his "New Frontier."

Mr. Clark enjoyed new status in the Senate with a liberal Democratic president and a new majority leader. He wrote and sponsored such major pieces of legislation as the Manpower Development and Training Act and the Area Redevelopment Act.

Kennedy repaid Mr. Clark by making several campaign appearances for him in 1962. Mr. Clark was reelected by 104,000 voters over Republican James Van Zandt.

Once re-elected, Mr. Clark was appointed to the Democratic steering committee, which determined all committee assignments. But Southern conservatives continued to dominate Mr. Clark's proposals to involve more liberals in the committee were repeatedly voted down.

Frustrated by his inability to change the Senate and impatient with committee procedures, Mr. Clark took his fight to the Senate floor. In February 1963, he gave a series of speeches, later published in book form as The Senate Establishment.

He asserted, "The Senate Establishment is almost the antithesis of democracy. . . . It is what might be called a self-perpetuating oligarchy, with only mild overtones of a plutocracy."

James MacGregor Burns, the Pulitizer Prize winning historian from Williams College, called Mr. Clark's speech" . . . of historical significance because it aims squarely at this century-old coalition as it operates quietly in the Senate. He has moved the power process out of dim and musty committee and caucus rooms into the spotlight of the Senate floor."

Mr. Clark continued his one-man assault on congressional leadership in spite of the obvious penalties.

Mr. Clark's influence at the White House declined after the Kennedy assassination. His relations with Johnson, his old adversary, fluctuated from cool to hostile.

In 1964, Mr. Clark voted for Johnson's Gulf of Tonkin resolution—along with such future Vietnam War critics as J. William Fulbright, Eugene McCarthy and George McGovern. But within a year, Mr. Clark broke with the Johnson Administration's war policy.

In the meantime, Mr. Clark faced political problems back home, largely of his own making.

During the 1963 primary elections, Mr. Clark had vigorously supported challenges to the Democratic Party organizations in far reaches of the state, asserting, "It's time to knock sleazy government out of the box in Western Pennsylvania."

It was not a winning campaign. Most of the Clark-supported candidates were beaten, and party stalwarts vowed to help defeat him in 1968.

They were helped by the National Rifle Association, which had singled Mr. Clark out as a major target since he endorsed strong gun registration laws. In rural Pennsylvania, literature was distributed to hunters and farmers solemnly warning that, "Clark Wants to Take Away Your Guns."

For the first time, he found himself opposed by a younger man, one who seemed equally progressive. In a series of televised debates, Richard S. Schweiker held his own against the aging reformer.

Unable to overcome the opposition of Western Pennsylvania Democratic leaders and the gun enthusiasts, Mr. Clark lost to Schweiker by 280,000 votes.

Mr. Clark took the loss gracefully, although he admitted later that he was "quite flabbergasted with the results."

Longstreth said he believes Mr. Clark was "very hurt" by the defeat.

Following his defeat, he spent two years as president of World Federalists U.S.A., a Washington-based group seeking to foster interest in development of world government. He also was chairman of the Coalition on National Priorities and Military Policy. And he continued to attend Capitol Hill luncheon meetings of Members of Congress for Peace Through Law, a group he organized.

He lectured at the University of Minnesota, Michigan State University, Temple University, Haverford College, Chestnut Hill College and the University of Pennsylvania.

Even in retirement, Mr. Clark continued to support quixotic causes. He returned to Philadelphia politics during the 1971 mayoral campaign, determined to prevent the election of Frank L. Rizzo. Mr. Clark actively supported Bill Green's losing effort in the Democratic primary, and, in the fall, supported Republican Longstreth.

In 1975, when Rizzo won the Democratic nomination, Mr. Clark became chairman of Charles Bowser's independent campaign. "I, for one, am not prepared to live in a fascist city," he said.

Mr. Clark's financial as well as political fortunes declined in recent years. His 1967 divorce from Noel Hall Clark, his wife of 31 years, drained much of his wealth. Before the divorce, Mr. Clark had listed his net worth at more than $1.1 million.

His wife, wealthy in her own right, received a large settlement. In 1968, Mr. Clark placed his net worth at $523,454. Five years later, his assets had dwindled to "around $250,000."

Mr. Clark married public relations executive Iris Cole Richey, 20 years his junior, shortly after the divorce. She shared his interests in politics and the outdoors. The Clarks often played mixed-doubles tennis and occasionally went horseback riding together.

And in odd moments, Mr. Clark tried his hand at writing again, but without marked success. He expressed disappointment at publishers' rejection slips for an autobiography, which he planned to call The Six Lives of Joseph Sill Clark.

No one familiar with Mr. Clark's political life could doubt that he had an ego. Associates suggested that his civility was maintained out of an inbred sense of noblesse oblige and the social expectation that anyone with his background would quite naturally be a "gentleman."

Those who dealt with him on a daily basis often found him cold, severe, somewhat imperious. Critics called him a snob. But free of pressures of the day, secure in his home, he became a different man.

Reporters who covered his administration and knew him during his years in Washington, often expressed shock to find that at night he exuded a friendly warmth, offered a boyish charm and exhibited a degree of understanding that countered his persona of the day.

In recent years, Mr. Clark has not been well. "He had many physical problems as a result of age, and he had his good days and his bad days," said Gregory Harvey, a lawyer involved in politics and a longtime friend.

Mr. Clark is survived by his wife, Iris; his son, Joseph S. Clark Jr.; his daughter, Mrs. Edward T. (Noel) Miller; a stepdaughter, seven grandchildren and three great grandchildren.

A private funeral was held for family members yesterday afternoon. A memorial service will be held at 11:30 a.m. Saturday at the Unitarian Church of Germantown, 6511 Lincoln Drive.

JOSEPH CLARK, FORMER SENATOR AND PHILADELPHIA MAYOR, DIES

Former U.S. Sen. Joseph S. Clark, 88, a Pennsylvania Democrat who swept the old guard out of Philadelphia's City Hall and tried to do the same in the halls of Congress, died Jan. 12 at his home in Philadelphia. The cause of death was not reported.

Mr. Clark is remembered for changes in the civil-service system during the 1950s as Philadelphia's first Democratic mayor in 67 years and for his advocacy of civil-rights issues and changes in Congress in Washington.

A series of speeches he gave in 1963, later published in book form as "The Senate Establishment," he attacked the upper chamber of Congress as "a self-perpetuating oligarchy." He also wrote another book, "Congress: The Sapless Branch."

In 1956, Mr. Clark was elected to the first of two Senate terms.

He sponsored the Manpower Development and Training Act and the Area Redevelopment Act, but was often frustrated by the chamber's ruling powers.

"The Senate establishment is almost the antithesis of democracy," Mr. Clark told his Senate colleagues in 1963. "It is what might be called a self-perpetuating oligarchy, with only mild overtones of a plutocracy."

James MacGregor Burns, the Pulitzer Prize-winning historian, called Mr. Clark's speech "of historical significance, because it aims squarely at this century-old coalition as its operates quietly in the Senate. He has moved the power process out of dim and musty committee and caucus rooms into the spotlight of the Senate floor.

Mr. Clark didn't initially support John F. Kennedy's 1960 presidential campaign, but he campaigned hard after the Massachusetts senator was nominated. Kennedy asked him to draw up a civil-rights program for his New Frontier program.

Mr. Clark eventually rose in the Senate, gaining seats on the Foreign Relations, Labor and Public Welfare and Rules and Administration committees.

His relationship with President Johnson was cool at best.

Although he supported Johnson's Vietnam War policy in the 1964 Gulf of Tonkin resolution in the Senate, he broke with the administration within a year.

A native Philadelphian, Mr. Clark graduated from Harvard and received a law degree from the University of Pennsylvania. During World War II, he was chief of staff, for the Eastern Air Command in the China-Burma-India theater.

In 1951, he was elected mayor, ending a corruption-ridden Republican administration. He replaced the city's spoils system with civil service regulations.

Mr. Clark said later his major accomplishments as mayor were "the reform of the police—taking them out of politics" and "the opening of a career service in city government to blacks."

Mr. Clark earned many political enemies in his own party when he declared during the 1963 primaries: "It's time to knock sleazy government out of the box in Western Pennsylvania."

When he sought reelection to the Senate in 1968, local Democratic leaders failed to work enthusiastically for him and he lost to Republican Richard Schweiker.

Mr. Clark later spent two years as chairman of World Federalists U.S.A., a Washington-based group that promotes an effective world government.

Survivors include his wife, Iris, a son, a daughter and a stepdaughter.

STATE DEPARTMENT HUMAN RIGHTS REPORT

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, today I joined with Congressman DANTE FASCELL, chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, in releasing the Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1989 prepared by the Department of State pursuant to sections 116(d) and 502B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended. These reports, which have been issued for more than 10 years, have become an indispensable tool for evaluating the progress—or lack of progress—in human rights performance throughout the world. They provide detailed information not only on the general human rights situation but also on specific categories of civil, political, economic, and social rights.

At times, past administrations have allowed foreign policy considerations to overcome objectivity in the preparation of these reports. In general, that does not appear to be the case this year. The section on China describes a systematic and continued abuse of human rights in that country despite efforts by the administration to improve our bilateral relations. The June 1989 massacre in Beijing and its aftermath are presented in detail, as is the Government's "indiscriminate and excessive use of force" in suppressing demonstrations in Lhasa, Tibet, last March. The section on Cambodia cites credible reports of human rights violations by the two factions of the non-Communist resistance to which the United States provides an assistance. It also describes the continued grievous abuses of human rights by the Khmer Rouge that is in political coalition with the non-Communist resistance, and serious human rights violations by the present Cambodian Government in Phnom Penh. The South African section is comprehensive, blunt in its discussion of Government abuses of power against antiapartheid groups, and balanced in its presentation of the Government's reform efforts.

The utility and effectiveness of these annual human rights reports correlate directly with the degree of objectivity. The more objective the reports, the brighter the spotlight on the offending countries and the stronger the message of U.S. concern about human rights violations throughout the world.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, has morning business been closed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business has not been closed.

The time for morning business has expired. Therefore, morning business is now closed.

ARMENIAN GENOCIDE DAY OF REMEMBRANCE

MOTION TO PROCEED

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on agreeing to the motion to proceed to Senate Joint Resolution 212 designating April 24, 1990, as a National Day of Remembrance of the 75th Anniversary of the Armenian Genocide of 1915 to 1923.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia suggests the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the evidence of ethnic tensions in the Balkans and in a number of Republics of the Soviet Union over the last few weeks is disturbing. The number of reported incidents is mounting, and we should be concerned about the trend toward violence and more violence, communal hatred, and lack of personal responsibility for mature tolerance and actions by those communities and their leaders. We should be taking whatever steps we can to mitigate these events, to emphasize the positive, to turn the restlessness and newly flexing muscles of political freedom into productive directions.

Cooperation among nations and among diverse peoples is essential if we are to turn away from the historic pattern of Western European wars. The essence of the difference between the Europe of the 1990's and that of the 1920's is the existence of a growing and vibrant transnational community, the Common Market, as well as other transnational institutions spawned by the Helsinki Final Act. The Europe of today is at a crossroads—will it prosper through enlightened integration and increased cooperation among many fronts, particularly economic, financial, and cultural, or will rivalries and ambitions feed competition and conflict?

The new Czechoslovak leader, Mr. Vaclav Havel, who delivered an inspired and inspiring address to a joint meeting of the Congress just a few hours ago, reminded us of our responsibilities in an era when as he stated, "history has accelerated." In an era when events are seeming to leap ahead of our control and even our understanding, he, a new leader and an old playwright, reminded us that the only reliable foundation for our actions is for us to accept responsibility for the consequences of our actions, and to accept responsibility for what we perceive as the probable outcomes of our decisions and, that may be applied to those of us who are Senators as we speak and act on this floor.

He reminds us that we are still a long way from being truly a "family of man." Earlier, this past Monday, he was quoted by the New York Times, saying that Czechoslovakian society "has awakened, from the human and civic point of view. But it has slept for so long and so deeply that on waking it still feels a little groggy, not yet in full command of its capacities. It is necessary somehow to watch over this awakening, to arouse the people to take charge of their spirit, to lead them back to a state of calm, mature, daytime vigilance." Mr. Havel said that he was coming to the United States to learn. "We are going there to learn," he said. "We are going there to learn from a democratic system like the one we enjoyed for only so brief a period, only 20 years, and lost." While this Czechoslovakian leader has come here to learn, we can also learn from him about taking the high road of responsibility for our actions, and for caring for the results of our actions as they might pertain to minorities which make up all these newly emerging states and societies.

That is a great lesson. Just before the recess I signed a letter authored by the distinguished minority leader, Mr. DOLE, regarding the problem of minority rights in Yugoslavia. Mr. DOLE indicated in his letter, which I joined, that ethnic Albanians have suffered from "extreme oppression at the hands of Serbian authorities." He indicated that the current Yugoslav political authorities are repressive and tyrannical, and despite that, that "democratic forces are emerging in various Yugoslav republics." The letter went on to say that "we are heartened by the development of democratic political parties in Yugoslavia and hope that these parties are given a chance to prosper." The letter encouraged the administration to be "more aggressive and public in its support for peaceful democratic change in Yugoslavia." I agree with the assessment of the minority leader, and I joined him in that letter.

I would point out, Mr. President, that no such repression exists today in Turkey. Democracy is working well. The rights of minorities are being respected. Yet, Mr. President, evidence of tensions and conflicts abounds on Turkey's borders. Ethnic tensions in Greece and Bulgaria have recently been heightened. According to the New York Times of February 7, 1990, Western diplomats in Athens said that there was growing concern in Athens and Sofia over unrest among Muslim minorities. Bulgaria, as is well known, has tried to force their departure. Far worse in the situation in the Soviet Union. Rioting was reported last Saturday, February 17, 1990, in the Soviet Republic of Uzbekistan as Muslims clashed with ethnic Armenians in Samarkand. It was reported that "the outbreak of violence in Uzbekistan follows 7 days of unrest in a neighboring Republic of Tadzhikistan, a mostly Muslim region bordering China and Afghanistan, where 20 people were killed and 568 wounded by Interior Ministry count." So there are three separate regions now which have recently experienced this type of ethnic violence in the Soviet Union.

Mr. President, a pattern of instability has clearly developed, having as its basis the treatment of minorities, and having a religious basis which needs to be cooled off, needs to be mediated, and efforts to nip it in the bud must now be made. I would strongly suggest we turn our attention to diplomacy and peacemaking, knowing that religious wars are the most brutal of wars, as we have witnessed throughout the ages, and knowing that the Middle East and South Asia are regions where we will have to exercise long-term patient diplomacy to protect our interests during the 1990's.

Mr. President, has the statement of the Czechoslovakian leader been placed in the RECORD?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Apparently, the Chair addresses the distinguished President pro tempore; the statement has not been printed in the Senate RECORD.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the address of the President of the Czechoslovak Republic to a joint meeting of the United States Congress of today, February 21, 1990, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE CZECHOSLOVAK REPUBLIC TO A JOINT MEETING OF THE UNITED STATES CONGRESS, WASHINGTON, DC, FEBRUARY 21, 1990

Dear Mr. Speaker, Dear Mr. President, Dear Senators, and Members of the House, Ladies and Gentlemen:

My advisors have advised me, on this important occasion, to speak in Czech. I don't know why. Perhaps they wanted you to enjoy the sweet sounds of my mother tongue.

The last time they arrested me, on October 27 of last year, I didn't know whether it was for two days or two years.

Exactly one month later, when the rock musician Michael Kocab told me that I would probably be proposed as a presidential candidate, I thought it was one of his usual jokes.

On the 10th of December 1989, when my actor friend Jiri Bartoska, in the name of the Civic Forum, nominated me as a candidate for the office of President of the Republic, I thought it was out of the question that the parliament we had inherited from the previous regime would elect me.

Twelve years later, when I was unanimously elected President of my country, I had no idea that in two months I would be speaking in front of this famous and powerful assembly, and that what I say would be heard by millions of people who have never heard of me and that hundreds of politicians and political scientists would study every word I say.

When they arrested me on October 27, I was living in a country ruled by the most conservative Communist government in Europe, and our society slumbered beneath the pall of a totalitarian system. Today, less than four months later, I am speaking to you as the representative of a country that has set out on the road to democracy, a country where there is complete freedom of speech, which is getting ready for free elections, and which wants to create a prosperous market economy and its own foreign policy.

It is all very strange indeed.

But I have not come here to speak of myself or my feelings, or merely to talk about my own country. I have used this small example of something I know well, to illustrate something general and important.

We are living in very odd times. The human face of the world is changing so rapidly that none of the familiar political speedometers are adequate.

We playwrights, who have to cram a whole human life or an entire historical era into a two-hour play, can scarcely understand this rapidity ourselves. And if it gives us trouble, think of the trouble it must give to political scientists, who spend their whole lives studying the realm of the probable.

Let me try to explain why I think the velocity of the changes in my country, in Central and Eastern Europe, and of course in the Soviet Union itself, has made such a significant impression on the face of the world today, and why it concerns the fate of us all, including you Americans. I would like to look at this, first from the political point of view, and then from a point of view that we might call philosophical.

Twice in this century, the world has been threatened by a catastrophe; twice this catastrophe was born in Europe, and twice you Americans, along with others, were called upon to save Europe, the whole world and yourselves. The first rescue mission—among other things—provided significant help to us Czechs and Slovaks.

Thanks to the great support of your President Wilson, our first President, Tomas Garrigue Masaryk, could found our modern independent state. He founded it, as you know, on the same principles on which the United States had been founded, as Masaryk's manuscripts held by the Library of Congress testify.

At the same time, the United States was making enormous strides. It became the most powerful nation on earth, and it understood the responsibility that flowed from this. Proof of this are the hundreds of thousands of your young citizens who gave their lives for the liberation of Europe, and the graves of American airmen and soldiers on Czechoslovak soil.

But something else was happening as well: the Soviet Union appeared, grew, and transformed the enormous sacrifices of its people suffering under totalitarian rule, into a strength that, after World War Two, made it the second most powerful nation in the world. It was a country that rightly gave people nightmares, because no one knew what would occur to its rulers next and what country they would decide to conquer and drag into their sphere of influence, as it is called in political language.

All of this taught us to see the world in bipolar terms, as two enormous forces, one a defender of freedom, the other a source of nightmares. Europe became the point of friction between these two powers and thus it turned into a single enormous arsenal divided into two parts. In this process, one half of the arsenal became part of that nightmarish power, while the other—the free part—bordering on the ocean and having no wish to be driven into it, was compelled, together with you, to build a complicated security system, to which we probably owe the fact that we still exist.

So you may have contributed to the salvation of us Europeans, of the world and thus of yourselves for a third time: you have helped us to survive until today—without a hot war this time—but merely a cold one.

And now what is happening: the totalitarian system in the Soviet Union and in most of its satellites is breaking down and our nations are looking for a way to democracy and independence. The first act in this remarkable drama began when Mr. Gorbachev and those around him, faced with the sad reality of their country, initiated their policy of "perestroika". Obviously they had no idea either what they were setting in motion or how rapidly events would unfold. We knew a lot about the enormous number of growing problems that slumbered beneath the honeyed, unchanging mask of socialism. But I don't think any of us knew how little it would take for these problems to manifest themselves in all their enormity, and for the longings of these nations to emerge in all their strength. The mask fell away so rapidly that, in the flood of work, we have literally no time even to be astonished.

What does all this mean for the world in the long run? Obviously a number of things. This is, I am firmly convinced, an historically irreversible process, and as a result Europe will begin again to seek its own identity without being compelled to be a divided armory any longer. Perhaps this will create the hope that sooner or later your boys will no longer have to stand on guard for freedom in Europe, or come to our rescue, because Europe will at last be able to stand guard over itself. But that is still not the most important thing: the main thing is, it seems to me, that these revolutionary changes will enable us to escape from the rather antiquated straitjacket of this bipolar view of the world, and to enter at last into an era of multipolarity. That is, into an era in which all of us—large and small—former slaves and former masters—will be able to create what your great President Lincoln called "the family of man". Can you imagine what a relief this would be to that part of the world which for some reason is called the Third World, even though it is the largest?

I don't think it's appropriate simply to generalize, so let me be specific:

(1) As you certainly know, most of the big wars and other conflagrations over the centuries have traditionally begun and ended on the territory of modern Czechoslovakia, or else they were somehow related to that area. Let the Second World War stand as the most recent example. This is understandable: whether we like it or not, we are located in the very heart of Europe, and thanks to this, we have no view of the sea, and no real navy. I mention this because political stability in our country has traditionally been important for the whole of Europe. This is still true today. Our government of national understanding, our present Federal Assembly, the other bodies of the state and I myself will personally guarantee this stability until we hold free elections, planned for June. We understand the terribly complex reasons, domestic political reasons above all, why the Soviet Union cannot withdraw its troops from our territory as quickly as they arrived in 1968. We understand that the arsenals built there over the past twenty years cannot be dismantled and removed overnight. Nevertheless, in our bilateral negotiations with the Soviet Union, we should like to have as many Soviet units as possible moved out of our country before the elections, in the interests of political stability. The more successful our negotiations, the more those who are elected in our places will be able to guarantee political stability in our country even after the elections.

(2) I often hear the question: How can the United States of America help us today? My reply is as paradoxical as the whole of my life has been: you can help us most of all if you help the Soviet Union on its irreversible, but immensely complicated road to democracy. It is far more complicated than the road possible to its former European satellities. You yourselves know best how to support, as rapidly as possible, the non-violent evolution of this enormous, multi-national body politic towards democracy and autonomy for all of its peoples. Therefore, it is not fitting for me to offer you any advice. I can only say that the sooner, the more quickly, and the more peacefully the Soviet Union begins to move along the road towards genuine political pluralism, respect for the rights of nations to their own integrity and to a working—that is a market—economy, the better it will be, not just for Czechs and Slovaks, but for the whole world. And the sooner you yourselves will be able to reduce the burden of the military budget borne by the American people. To put it metaphorically: the millions you give to the East today will soon return to you in the form of billions in savings.

(3) It is not true that the Czech writer Vaclav Havel wishes to dissolve the Warsaw Pact tomorrow and then NATO the day after that, as some eager journalists have written. Vaclav Havel merely thinks what he has already said here, that for another hundred years, American soldiers shouldn't have to be separated from their mothers just because Europe is incapable of being a guarantor of world peace, which it ought to be, in order to make some amends, at least, for having given the world two world wars. Sooner or later Europe must recover and come into its own, and decide for itself how many of whose soldiers it needs so that its own security, and all the wider implications of that security, may radiate peace into the whole world. Vaclav Havel cannot make decisions about things it is not proper for him to decide. He is merely putting in a good word for genuine peace, and for achieving it quickly.

(4) Czechoslovakia thinks that the planned summit conference of countries participating in the Helsinki process should take place soon, and that in addition to what it wants to accomplish, it should aim to hold the so-called Helsinki Two conference earlier than 1992, as originally planned. Above all, we feel it could be something far more significant than has so far seemed possible. We think that Helsinki Two should become something equivalent to the European peace conference, which has not yet been held; one that would finally put a formal end to the Second World War and all its unhappy consequences. Such a conference would officially bring a future democratic Germany, in the process of unifying itself, into a new pan-European structure which could decide about its own security system. This system would naturally require some connection with that part of the globe we might label the "Helsinki" part, stretching westward from Vladivostok all the way to Alaska. The borders of the European states, which by the way should become gradually less important, should finally be legally guaranteed by a common, regular treaty. It should be more than obvious that the basis for such a treaty would have to be general respect for human rights, genuine political pluralism and genuinely free elections.

(5) Naturally we welcome the initiative of President Bush, which was essentially accepted by Mr. Gorbachev as well, according to which the number of American and Soviet troops in Europe should be radically reduced. It is a magnificent shot in the arm for the Vienna disarmament talks and creates favorable conditions not only for our own efforts to achieve the quickest possible departure of Soviet troops from Czechoslovakia, but indirectly as well for our own intention to make considerable cuts in the Czechoslovak army, which is disproportionately large in relation to our population. If Czechoslovakia were forced to defend itself against anyone, which we hope will not happen, then it will be capable of doing so with a considerably smaller army, because this time its defense would be—not only after decades but even centuries—supported by the common and indivisible will of both its nations and its leadership. Our freedom, independence and our new-born democracy have been purchased at great cost, and we will not surrender them. For the sake of order, I should add that whatever steps we take are not intended to complicate the Vienna disarmament talks, but on the contrary to facilitate them.

(6) Czechoslovakia is returning to Europe. In the general interest and in its own interest as well, it wants to coordinate this return—both politically and economically—with the other returnees, which means, above all, with its neighbors the Poles and the Hungarians. We are doing what we can to coordinate these returns. And at the same time, we are doing what we can so that Europe will be capable of really accepting us, its wayward children. Which means that it may open itself to us, and may begin to transform its structures—which are formally European but de facto Western European—in that direction, but in such a way that it will not be its detriment, but rather to its advantage.

(7) I have already said this in our parliament, and I would like to repeat it here, in this Congress, which is architecturally far more attractive: for many years, Czechoslovakia—as someone's meaningless satellite—has refused to face up honestly to its co-responsibility for the world. It has a lot to make up for. If I dwell on this and so many important things here, it is only because I feel—along with my fellow citizens—a sense of culpability for our former reprehensible passivity, and a rather ordinary sense of indebtedness.

(8) Last but not least, we are of course delighted that your country is so readily lending its support to our fresh efforts to renew democracy. Both our peoples were deeply moved by the generous offers made a few days ago in Prague at the Charles University, one of the oldest in Europe, by your Secretary of State, Mr. James Baker. We are ready to sit down and talk about them.

Ladies and gentlemen, I've only been president for two months and I haven't attended any schools for presidents. My only school was life itself. Therefore I don't want to burden you any longer with my political thoughts, but instead I will move on to an area that is more familiar to me, to what I would call the philosophical aspect of those changes that still concern everyone, although they are taking place in our corner of the world.

As long as people are people, democracy in the full sense of the word will always be no more than an ideal; one may approach it as one would a horizon, in ways that may be better or worse, but it can never be fully attained. In this sense you too are merely approaching democracy. You have thousands of problems of all kinds, as other countries do. But you have one great advantage: you have been approaching democracy uninterruptedly for more than two hundred years, and your journey toward that horizon has never been disrupted by a totalitarian system. Czechs and Slovaks, despite their humanistic traditions that go back to the first millennium, have approached democracy for a mere twenty years, between the two world wars, and now for the three and a half months since the 17th of November of last year.

The advantage that you have over us is obvious at once.

The communist type of totalitarian system has left both our nations. Czechs and Slovaks—as it has all the nations of the Soviet Union and the other countries the Soviet Union subjugated in its time—a legacy of countless dead, an infinite spectrum of human suffering, profound economic decline, and above all enormous human humiliation. It has brought us horrors that fortunately you have not known.

At the same time, however—unintentionally, of course—it has given us something positive: a special capacity to look, from time to time, somewhat further than someone who has not undergone this bitter experience. A person who cannot move and live a somewhat normal life because he is pinned under a boulder has more time to think about his hopes than someone who is not trapped in this way.

What I am trying to say is this: we must all learn many things from you, from how to educate our offspring, how to elect our representatives, all the way to how to organize our economic life so that it will lead to prosperity and not to poverty. But it doesn't have to be merely assistance from the well-educated, the powerful and the wealthy to someone who has nothing and therefore has nothing to offer in return.

We too can offer something to you: our experience and the knowledge that has come from it.

This is a subject for books, many of which have already been written and many of which have yet to be written. I shall therefore limit myself to a single idea.

The specific experience I'm talking about has given me one great certainty: Consciousness precedes Being, and not the other way around, as the Marxists claim.

For this reason, the salvation of this human world lies nowhere else than in the human heart, in the human power to reflect, in human meekness and in human responsibility.

Without a global revolution in the sphere of human consciousness, nothing will change for the better in the sphere of our Being as humans, and the catastrophe towards which this world is headed, whether it be ecological, social, demographic or a general breakdown of civilization, will be unavoidable. If we are no longer threatened by world war, or by the danger that the absurd mountains of accumulated nuclear weapons might blow up the world, this does not mean that we have definitively won. We are in fact far from definitive victory.

We are still a long way from that "family of man"; in fact, we seem to be receding from the ideal rather than drawing closer to it. Interests of all kinds: personal, selfish, state, national, group and, if you like, company interests still considerably outweigh genuinely common and global interests. We are still under the sway of the destructive and vain belief that man is the pinnacle of creation, and not just a part of it, and that therefore everything is permitted. There are still many who say they are concerned not for themselves but for the cause, while they are demonstrably out for themselves and not for the cause at all. We are still destroying the planet that was entrusted to us, and its environment. We still close our eyes to the growing social, ethnic and cultural conflicts in the world. From time to time we say that the anonymous megamachinery we have created for ourselves no longer serves us, but rather has enslaved us, yet we still fail to do anything about it.

In other words, we still don't know how to put morality ahead of politics, science and economics. We are still incapable of understanding that the only genuine backbone of all our actions—if they are to be moral—is responsibility. Responsibility to something higher than my family, my country, my firm, my success. Responsibility to the order of Being, where all our actions are indelibly recorded and where, and only where, they will be properly judged.

The interpreter or mediator between us and this higher authority is what is traditionally referred to as human conscience.

If I subordinate my political behavior to this imperative mediated to me by my conscience, I can't go far wrong. If on the contrary I were not guided by this voice, not even ten presidential schools with two thousand of the best political scientist in the world could help me.

This is why I ultimately decided—after resisting for a long time—to accept the burden of political responsibility.

I'm not the first, nor will I be the last, intellectual to do this. On the contrary, my feeling is that there will be more and more of them all the time. If the hope of the world lies in human consciousness, then it is obvious that intellectuals cannot go on forever avoiding their share of responsibility for the world and hiding their distaste for politics under an alleged need to be independent.

It is easy to have independence in your program and then leave others to carry that program out. If everyone thought that way, pretty soon no one would be independent.

I think that you Americans should understand this way of thinking. Wasn't it the best minds of your country, people you could call intellectuals, who wrote your famous Declaration of Independence, your Bill of Human Rights and your Constitution and who—above all—took upon themselves the practical responsibility for putting them into practice? The worker from Branik in Prague that your President referred to in his State of the Union message this year is far from being the only person in Czechoslovakia, let alone in the world, to be inspired by those great documents. They inspire us all. They inspire us despite the fact that they are over two hundred years old. They inspire us to be citizens.

When Thomas Jefferson wrote that, "Governments are instituted among Men deriving their just Powers from the Consent of the Governed", it was a simple and important act of the human spirit.

What gave meaning to that act, however, was the fact that the author backed it up with his life. It was not just his words, it was his deeds as well.

I will end where I began: history has accelerated. I believe that once again, it will be the human mind that will notice this acceleration, give it a name, and transform those words into deeds.

Thank you.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the matter before the Senate is of great significance and deserving of fuller and more careful treatment than it has been accorded. Under the guise of a commemorative resolution we are considering a measure which may have grave policy consequences for the United States and the West.

Furthermore, Mr. President, we are dealing with a country that has been among our closest of allies for many years, but which few of us understand a great deal about. It is true that many of us realize that Turkey has played an important role in the defense of the West, but we probably have—at least some of us—little idea as to how this all came to be. In addition, Turkey's history, predominant religion, and culture are very different from our own and, hence, the matter of information or a lack thereof has a tendency to lead to misunderstanding, and some prejudice.

Let me add, as well, that this is before us at a time of welcomed change, rapid change in the world, and none of us can reliably predict the consequences of that change. Even President Bush, with all of the facilities of the executive branch of the Government at his disposal, said just recently, on Monday, February 9, in a press conference, that it is impossible to predict the outcome of some of these changes.

I would say, therefore, that supporting one faction or another faction in a troubled place at a critical time—and this is a critical time—is also an unwelcome consequence of this resolution.

This point was made recently in a Wall Street Journal editorial on October 19, 1989, after the Senate Judiciary Committee voted out this resolution. And I shall read the editorial into the RECORD. It is titled, "Turkey Today":

One of the most remarkable features of the forced marches of the ethnic Turks out of Bulgaria over the past 5 months has been the lack of international attention. The deportation of more than 315,000 men, women, and children by the Bulgarian regime adds up to one of the largest migrations seen in the postwar years. Yet, some people are advancing a chilling casuistry: that what we are seeing is somehow the understandable result of the historical sins committed by the Turks in the 16th century. Today's Turks in Bulgaria, in other words, deserve what is coming to them 4 centuries later.

As if this weren't enough, the Senate Judiciary Committee is getting into the act. On Tuesday it approved Senator BOB DOLE's proposed commemorative resolution designating April 24, 1990, as the National Day of Remembrance of the 75th Anniversary of the Armenian Genocide of 1915-1923, suffered at the hands of the warring Ottoman Empire.

There can be no quibbling that the Armenians endured terrible suffering, but one has to wonder what possible good such a resolution will achieve. It puts great strain on a longstanding U.S. friendship with Turkey, a country that has been one of America's strongest allies in NATO. The resolution also comes at a time when Turkey has been seeking help from the United States in resolving its Bulgarian emigration controversy and pursuing democratic reforms that may lead to membership in the European Community.

Turkey has been fighting its past for years and, this far, has been only partially successful. Must it now accept that one of its strongest allies—blames it for the genocide of another people? Such sentiment only encourages the adverse feelings toward Turkey that surfaced when Turkey asked for assistance in dealing with its Bulgarian emigration crisis.

Meaning the United States, of course—

Still reading from the Wall Street Journal editorial of October 10, 1989:

Mr. Dole's odd effort notwithstanding, most of Turkey's political problems lie with the Europeans. Part of the problem some Europeans have with Turkey seems to stem from its location—Turkey is not really a part of Europe.

That is what the editorial says:

Why, they wonder, should it belong to the EC? Another anti-Turkish hook is the Islamic faith of the majority of the Turkish people: Turkey, we are told, is not a Christian nation; its people simply won't fit in with the Western European Judeo-Christian tradition. It is when these rationalizations fall on deaf ears that the old standby of retribution for treatment at the hands of the Ottoman Empire, comes to the fore.

No one has to accept the sins of the Ottoman Empire to reject that argument. Turkey, in any event, is long past it. The country has in recent years accepted more than 500,000 refugees from at least four bordering nations.

Kurds, suffering what many people consider to be a current extermination campaign at the hands of Syria, Iran, and Iraq have inundated eastern Turkey. Now it is their fellow Turks arriving as refugees from Bulgaria.

The Turkish refugee tragedy and the ongoing crisis cannot be ignored and shuttled off to that notorious dustbin of history that has become so convenient recently. Surely, the past suffering of any people at any time cannot be simply filed away and forgotten. But what the Senate Judiciary Committee had done in supporting the strongly worded Armenian resoltuion achieves no useful end; it merely produces more controversy and embittered memories.

Congress has enough difficulty dealing with the realities of the world as it currently exists. Bulgaria's government has been behaving beyond the pale for months, and the U.S. does its values no credit by ignoring that while casting its votes into the past.

Therefore, Mr. President, in keeping with an old proverb: "He who does not express his problems will not find a solution," I feel compelled to speak. However, I hope that in the course of my remarks about this unfortunate commemorative resolution to head the admonition of another proverb which says "Open your mouth only for good news," an admonition against nay saying.

So in that spirit, Mr. President, I wish to speak today about Turkey and its people, about the founding of the republic, which is our valued ally, and about some of the remarkable achievements of that republic.

I also intend to speak about what is going on in the Soviet Union and in Eastern Europe, about what this means to Turkey, and what it means to us.

Mr. President, I believe that few Americans genuinely understand that Turkey is a virbrant, modern nation that has incorporated Western Values and melded them into her own fascinating culture, rooted in Central Asia and in the Islamic world. Because of this, Turkey is not only in a position to encourage and to promote those Western values which she has adopted and which are symbolized by her way of life and her commitment to such institutions as the European Common Market and NATO, but she also stands as a unique model for the Middle East and other part of the Muslim world.

With firm national purpose and a growing economy now operating according to the principles of the free market, there is great hope that the recent economic expansion will continue. I believe that Turkey will be one of the greatest of success stories of the early 21st century, just as she has come so far since the founding of the republic early in this century.

There is another point that I will attempt to emphasize as well, Mr. President. Especially since we in the Senate and many other Americans tend to think about Turkey as a military ally and know little perhaps beyond that, we should ponder for a moment how different Turkey's experience is from that of East Europe or Latin America.

On three occasions since World War II, most recently in 1980, the Turkish army at the highest levels of command found itself constrained to take the reins of the government and then to return authority to civilians.

It should remind us of Lucius Quinctius Cincinnatus who was a great Roman general and statesman in 458 B.C.

Cincinnatus was sent for by the Roman Senate. He was a patriotic man of wealth, and he is a part of the great legend of the Roman Republic. Rome was beset by the forces of the Aequians when the Senate sent messages to Cincinnatus and asked him to take over the country and be its dictator and rid it of the forces that were attacking it. So he left his plow, organized the military forces, surrounded the Aequians and defeated them, and he then went back to Rome laden with the spoils of victory.

After 16 days he gave up the dictatorship and went back to the plow in his fields.

Nineteen years later, in 439 B.C., he was asked again to come to Rome and be the dictator. He was 80 years old or thereabouts, but he went and he defeated the forces of Spurius Melius, and then again gave up the dictatorship and went back to his farm.

So it was, we may say, that in the spirit of Cincinnatus, the Turkish military three times took over the operation of the government and the country of Turkey, and after restoring stability and order, gave the government back over to civilian control, a kind of rare thing these days, perhaps as rare as was the example set by Cincinnatus in 458 B.C. and again in 439 B.C.

The Turkish military did so consistently, and this is, indeed, a measure of their dedication to democracy and proof of their high regard for the tenents of Ataturk which he himself described as republicanism, populism, etatism, secularism and nationalism.

(Mr. ADAMS assumed the chair.)

Mr. BYRD. I believe this remarkable phenomenon shows that Turkish society really does wish to be the western-oriented friend of the United States and Europe which Ataturk envisioned and which his country has indeed become.

Perhaps some of us remember reading about the famous battle at Gallipoli in World War I, where Turkish soldiers fought the Allied Forces to a standstill. They do not lack for bravery, Mr. President, they have got it. They are not lacking in courage. It is inherent. Some of us may have seen a cinema film made a few years ago about that campaign, as horrible as any in the First World War for its loss of life on all sides. Few of us know, however, that Ataturk was the Ottoman general who commanded that campaign, one of the few successes of the Ottoman armies in World War I.

That very same man, who emerged from a military staff college education, led the forces which overthrew the old Empire and paved the way for a modern, secular, pro-western democracy in Turkey. The present day Turkish Army, which seems to be the institution in Turkey which seems most familiar to many Americans, remains firmly in that democratic tradition.

The struggle to establish democracy in Turkey provides a remarkable example of national will and useful lesson for all of us in a time when we are trying to decide how the world will look after the upheavals we are currently witnessing in so many places.

Perhaps there is even more of us to learn from Turkey than simply studying her example. The Turks have had a long involvement with those countries which are now in upheaval. For more than seven centuries the Turks have fought some of them, ruled many of them, and been defeated by yet others of them.

Today's Turkey sits in the middle of upheaval—she borders Eastern Europe, the U.S.S.R., Iran, and Iraq—and all around her is turmoil. That alone should tell us how ill-timed this resolution is, but I think there is a much more important lesson to be learned. Since we are trying to figure out what comes next in Europe and in the Soviet Union as part of Europe and part of Asia, including Turkish-speaking Russians, perhaps we can also learn the Turkish experience more than just what it means to build democracy in that kind of environment under such circumstances, surrounded by countries in such great turmoil, to plant the seed in the soil where it has never survived before.

Mr. President, rather than casting opprobrium on a friend and all in an ill-considered way, we should be looking to that friend and ally for help and advice. We should talk with that friend whose people have been dealing with Europe, yes, and with Russia since before the Europeans even discovered the continent on which we live. Perhaps the Turks will have some sage advice, based on their 700 years of foreign policy experience, about what might be coming in Europe and in central Asia, an area where they may again be a principal actor.

Therefore, Mr. President, I will speak about what the Turks have learned from us—democracy and the way to a free-market economy—and about what we can learn from them—history, at a time when the world is struggling to open a new chapter of peace and prosperity.

I believe it will also be evident, Mr. President, how little most of us know of this place called Turkey. Few Senators go to Turkey often. Perhaps none of us do. I first visited Turkey in 1955, 35 years ago, as a member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee. I was on the Subcommittee of the Far East, chaired by Mr. Zablocki. And on that occasion we went around the world in an old Constellation, a four-engine propeller craft.

We were gone, I do not recall whether it was 68 days or 72 days, but it was thereabouts. We left in early to mid-October and came back in December.

And on that trip was Mrs. Marguerite Stitt Church and Ross Adair, John Jarman, Mr. Wigglesworth, Dr. Judd, and myself, a delegation of seven. And we visited France, Italy, Turkey, Lebanon, Syria, Jordan, Israel, Egypt, Iraq, Iran, Thailand, Burma, Ceylon, India, Sumatra, Indonesia, Malaysia, Vietnam, Cambodia, Korea, Hong Kong, and Japan; we came back by Hawaii. That was before Hawaii became a State of the United States. And back to Washington.

It was my first trip abroad. We were in Afghanistan; also, Pakistan and India. But I remember on that trip, as I have been on subsequent trips to Turkey—yes, we were in Greece. I may not have missed any country when I traveled, that was in our itinerary.

But I marveled at the Turks. We went out and watched some of their soldiers: tough, with great esprit de corps.

I forget what they were paid, but it seems to me it was something like 18 cents a day. I would have to review my notes to be sure.

But it was a mere pittance of a pittance. And, yet, they were dependable, courageous fighting people.

So we do not know a great deal about that place called Turkey, one of our best allies. It should also be clear how little we, in what we proudly call the world's greatest deliberative body, how little we have deliberated about this resolution. And it is the world's greatest deliberative body. I hope to publish before this year of our Lord 1990 is gone, the second volume of "The Senate 1789-1989."

This will be a topical history, the first volume having been a chronological history. It will be a topical history. There, we will study about the rules of the Senate and about the vestigal roots of those rules being deep in the soil of the English Parliament, even the Congress under the Confederation and the rules of the First Congress.

We will talk about the committee system. There will be three chapters on the committee system. There will be four chapters on the filibuster. Filibuster, the bane of majority leaders, but without which this Senate would not be the Senate, a remarkable institution.

Gladstone, who was Prime Minister of England four times, the greatest statesman during the reign of Queen Victoria, who reigned from the year 1837 to the year 1901, 64 years. Someday, I will talk a little about English history. It has been a matter of great interest to me, the history of England. I want to talk about the English monarchs, going back to the time of the heptarchy, when there were provinces, Anglo-Saxon provinces, the heptarchies of Sussex and Essex and Kent and Wessex and Mercia and East Anglia and Northumbria; go back to the kingship of Cerdic, 519-534, almost 1,500 years ago, almost 80 monarchs ago. But that can wait for another time.

But Gladstone referred to the Senate as "that remarkable body," the most remarkable of all the inventions of modern politics; "that remarkable body."

And so it is a great deliberative body. As I say, there will be four chapters on the filibuster, and this is a very mild kind of filibuster that I may be carrying on here.

And there will be two chapters on impeachment. I had to await the wrapping up of my work on impeachment until the Senate completed its two trials of last October and November when, within a period of 15 days, it convicted and ordered removed from office, and they were removed from office, two Federal judges.

So I had to await final chapter, the final action and removal of those two judges before completing my work on the two chapters on impeachment.

And then there will be three chapters on the meeting places of the Senate; a chapter on the press galleries; a chapter on the Capitol Police, and a chapter on Richard Russell, who was a Member of this Senate when I came to the Senate 31 years ago; a chapter on Aaron Burr, who was a Member of the Senate before I came here but who on March the 3d or 4th, I have to recall, 1805, made his last speech to this body. He presided over this body for 4 years, and although he had been indicted in the States of New York and New Jersey for the murder of Alexander Hamilton, he had come back to the Senate to preside over this body when it met in other precincts of this Capitol.

He had presided as though nothing had ever happened. He had shot Alexander Hamilton, delivering a fatal wound at Weehawken, NJ. And then after visiting his daughter, Burr's daughter, Theodosia, he had come back to Washington to preside over the impeachment trial of Samuel Chase. He presided with such skill and dignity and fairness that even his enemies commended him. As he made that last speech, he said, "This House is a sanctuary, a citadel of law, of order, and of liberty. And it's here, here in this exalted refuge, here, if anywhere, will resistance be made to the storms of political frenzy and the silent march of corruption. And if the Constitution be destined ever to perish at the sacrilegious hands of the demagog or the usurper which God averts, its expiring agonies will be witnessed on this floor."

Many times have I thought of what Burr said. "If the Constitution be destined ever to perish, its expiring agonies will be witnessed on this floor." For this is truly a deliberative body, Mr. President. I have learned a great deal since the first day that I walked into this Chamber. I am still learning.

It was not too many years ago that I recommended that there be a nondebatable motion to proceed to the consideration of bills and resolutions; that it be perhaps a debate of motion subject to 1 hour or 2 hours' debate. I was majority leader then. I said that those who wish to debate a matter can have ample time after the matter is before the Senate to debate it.

There is no need to have debate, certainly unlimited debate, on a motion to proceed because those who are opposed to a bill or resolution have many opportunities: there are many opportunities for Senators who oppose a bill or resolution to debate, or, yes, even filibuster a bill or resolution. They can filibuster it when it is before the Senate. They can filibuster it three times: When the motion is made to insist upon the Senate's amendments, to ask for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on behalf of the Senate. Three opportunities as a divisible motion, three opportunities to filibuster right there, and then when the message comes back from the House in whatever form, or, if it is a conference report, the opportunity is there again to filibuster. So why filibuster a motion to proceed?

As I say, I was looking through the eyes of the majority leader. But I have been minority leader as well, and I have been a Senator without the portfolio of leadership. So I see the Senate through many different eyes. I stand here today and confess my erring ways, confess to the sin of having been indistinct, confess to the faulty judgment of which all men are at times capable.

I would not support a change in the rules that provide for a nondebatable motion to proceed. One can already be had in today's rules if one can make the motion after morning business is completed or after the first hour has run its course in a new legislative day and before the second hour. But except for that and in those instances in which we have perhaps again failed in our judgment and provided for expedited action in certain areas and circumstance, I would not want to give my support to a nondebatable motion to proceed because I can see the wisdom of having debate itself, lengthy debate, on the motion to proceed. That is where we are today.

I do not know whether the opposing forces will be able to invoke cloture. They may be able to do it. They may not. But there is no doubt in my mind that there probably will be a majority in the Senate that will support cloture.

And then, if that is the case and we get the resolution before us, this is not the kind of legislative matter that makes the blood boil, that excites the flow of adrenalin, not the kind of measure that would invite numerous amendments from all quarters of these four walls. It is the kind of measure which, if cloture is finally invoked, probably will not be subjected to many amendments certainly.

And so our only hope to defeat this resolution is to prevent its ever coming up, prevent its ever being called up. And to do that under the Senate rules will require that the supporters of cloture muster 60 stalwart Senators. But therein lies a tale.

The fact that this resolution is not the kind of measure which would be considered an earthshaking measure in this body belies its true significance and makes it all the more important that cloture not be invoked on it. So it bears the guise of an innocent commemorative.

Mr. President, Turkey is a large and diverse country whose population is 98 percent Moslem. However, the great majority of that Turkish population has a secular political orientation—that is remarkable, a secular political orientation—and a population that is 98 percent Moslem resolutely committed to a secular democracy and resolutely committed to being part of our Western world on the basis of equality and mutual respect.

And there are radical, fundamentalist forces in Turkey that would like to see it turned the other way, that would like to see it turn its back upon the West, and would like to see this resolution adopted by the Senate. It would become an arrow in their arsenal, their goal of turning Turkey away from a pro-Western orientation.

But the great majority of that Turkish population does not want to turn the other way, and it is to be hoped that they will not be provoked to turn the other way. The fact that they are resolutely committed to a secular democracy and oriented toward the West is no accident. It did not come about simply by coincidence. When Ataturk founded the Turkish Republic in 1923, there was no single example in the world to suggest that the adventure on which she was launched might succeed, but succeed it did.

When the Turkish Republic emerged from the ashes of the Ottoman Empire after World War I, everyplace its borders were drawn had been crossed recently by warring armies. Even the basic institutions of government had collapsed and much had to begin anew.

The early years were spent on building the institutions that would make for a new country and a new viewpoint. Western dress was adopted; men gave up the fez and women gave up the veil. The Latin alphabet was modified slightly and it replaced Arabic script.

In the villages and in the towns, traditional dress was replaced by Western suits, to go along with those Western hats and Western caps. And the alphabet reform marked the beginning of a village literacy program and a push for universal education.

In the place of the religious establishment, which had been headed by the Ottoman sultan and which had had a major role in governing society, came the separation of religion and state. That achievement, Mr. President, is worth a careful look. When we think about a similar attempt in Iran, which began about the same time but finally ended with the overthrow of the Shah; or when we think about other countries in the troubled Middle East, based on those principles of separation of state and religion, Turkey has created a society which does, indeed, reconcile many values which would seem to appear to be contradictory and which have proved to be contradictory in many societies. Turkey has achieved a success which so far has eluded some other countries.

There has been a widespread belief that a Moslem country could not preserve its religious and cultural identity while at the same time striving for democracy and a free market economy. The case of Turkey suggests otherwise. That does not mean the path in Turkey has been easy or that it has been clear, free of stones and steep places.

But we must not lose sight of the magnitude of the task their people confronted; nor should we neglect to remember the failures of the other countries in the Islamic world, where religious reaction and fanaticism have regained control. Turkey has shown what can be achieved. Turkey is an encouraging example for other countries in the region to seek their own democratic framework.

Perhaps part of the explanation is in the early history of the Turks. It may have to do with the human material and cultural traditions which Ataturk had to work with when he set about rebuilding a state for the Turks on the ashes of the defeated and dismembered Ottoman Empire. It may not be very obvious to us, immediately, but Ataturk's was a piercing analysis of what had come before and where the world was going.

Ataturk obviously saw clearly the implications of the collapse of the world order of old ancient Empires. The Ottoman Empire, the Austro-Hungarian Empire, the German Empire, and the Russian Empire, had each fallen to war or revolution. Ataturk also must have understood very well the goals of the British and the French victors in the Middle East.

Ataturk rejected a League of Nations mandate unless the United States agreed to be the mandatory power, and led a successful war of independence to assure that Turkey would not be colonized by Britatin or France, as happened in the rest of the region.

It is not so much an irony of history, Mr. President, as a lesson to be borne in mind, that the countries in great upheaval today, the countries of Eastern and Central Europe and the U.S.S.R., are exactly those countries that were parts of the great Empires which met their end in World War I.

Compare the history of Turkey since 1923 with that of Germany or Poland, or Russia, or Hungary. How remarkable, indeed, was that vision of Ataturk's, Mr. President.

As I said, part of that success must have depended on the Turks themselves. Although they were Muslims, and ruled most of the Arab World until the end of World War I, they had an identity which was tied to the West as well. They wanted to be tied to the West.

Their origins were as nomads in the Central Asian steppes, speaking the languages of those areas. They came into the Islamic world as soldiers, and, in time, established their own dynasties, and by the late 1300's had not only conquered much of the East, but also a great deal of southeastern Europe.

In 1453, Constantinople, which the Turks now call Istanbul, was conquered by them as well, and they became the successors to the Roman Empire.

Constantinople was the old crossroads of the world, where Asia met Europe and where the travelers from Afghanistan, Samarkand, and other faraway places brought their laces, their jewels, their fragrant ointments to the West. There it sat astride the Bosporus and the Dardanelles. The Bosporus is that strait that separates Europe from Asia and connects the Sea of Marmara with the Black Sea. The Dardanelles constitute that strait that separate India and Asia from Europe and connects the Sea of Marmara with the Aegean Sea. Constantinople—today Istanbul.

The Turks continued to expand into Europe, ruling Romania, Hungary, reaching as far as Vienna, which they came within a hair's breadth of conquering in 1683.

This brief historical discourse in which I have encapsulated the wars of centuries into just a few words is simply meant to point out that the Turks have been tied to the West in many ways, many ways, for centuries. But in Europe they were seen for very long as the dreaded infidel, the enemy, the threatening.

This observation is worth bearing in mind as we consider today how we ourselves view them. We too have our prejudices and our cultural predilections which are often hard to break. We, in this Senate are, many of us, fully aware of how hard it can be to break through old beliefs and create a changed order in society, let alone a new one.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN] or other Senators, for remarks; that I retain my right to the floor following the conclusion of their remarks; that my speech not show an interruption in the RECORD nor be considered a second speech on this subject when I resume.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I rise to support the Senator from West Virginia in what I think is a very important stand that he is taking. I believe that he is absolutely correct in his analysis of the resolution, which is now called Senate Joint Resolution 212, because I believe that if this resolution is passed in its present form we will harm the United States-Turkish relations. I believe we will weaken the southern flank of NATO in a period of time when we certainly do not need to be causing problems in that area of the world and in that area of our alliance, and I also believe that we will undermine our military capabilities in an area of the globe that is very important, vital indeed, to our national interest.

I understand the desire of the Armenian community to commemorate the Armenian victims of the period from 1915 to 1923. I am very sensitive to that. I am also sensitive to the tragic, bloodstained pages in the lengthy and proud history of the Armenian people. There is no question that innocent Armenian men, women, and children lost their lives in Europe some 70 years ago. There is no question that the recent earthquake in Soviet Armenia brought death and terrible suffering to the Armenian and other peoples in the area, and there is no question that in the past few weeks and months, as we witnessed with great sadness on television, innocent Armenian men, women, and children lost their lives in the southern Republics of the Soviet Union.

It is certainly true that the Armenian people have known injustice and suffering. It is also true that injustice and suffering have not been unique to the Armenian people. All continents of our planet witnessed injustices inflicted by one group of people upon another. That is the tragedy of history, whether the injustices have been caused by tribal or ethnic or religious or economic or ideological or some other set of reasons. Many of these injustices involve terrible tragedies, bitter memories, and deep aches that do not fade.

I believe we must speak out when fundamental human rights are being violated, and I believe that this Senate does that frequently with effect. But I also think we should be restrained in looking back through the pages of history to specify injustices of past generations that revive bitter memories and deep passions in a way that can cause new problems for this generation. We have to be very careful here that we do not create more problems than we solve.

I do not see any problems that this resolution is going to solve, but I see a lot of problems it could cause. If I thought this resolution could wipe out the tears and the suffering and tragedy of the Armenian people then my perspective on it would be different, but I am afraid we are going to inflame a situation now that does not need inflaming and I think we are going to cause additional problems if this resolution passes.

Mr. President, the Turkish Government has made it clear that passage of the resolution before us will cause serious damage to the partnership between the United States and Turkey that we worked so hard to build.

The question of characterizing events that took place some 70 years ago as genocide may at first glance seem rather remote and academic to us, and it did to me when I first saw the resolution. Yet no one can doubt this issue has immediate emotional relevance to both the Armenian and the Turkish people. The current bloodshed in the southern Soviet Republics provides tragic evidence of the current relevance of this sort of historical enmity.

I believe that emotionally charged questions about complex historical events are better left to qualified scholars than addressed by us in well-intentioned but counterproductive legislative action.

I believe that Senate Joint Resolution 212 falls short because in using the term "genocide" it appears to endorse a highly controversial view, unacceptable to Turkey, of what happened in the confusion surrounding the fall of the Ottoman Empire more than a half century ago.

How many scholars do we have here on that period of history? How many of the people cosponsoring this resolution could get up and without notes give us an historical recitation of this period? How many could go back and say with any kind of certainty what really happened then and who was to blame?

I am afraid we are now debating a resolution and pretending we are historians when our real role is to try to protect the future by learning from the past. I think we ought to learn from the past and I think we ought to have great sympathy for those who suffered in the past, but I want to make it abundantly clear I do not think we should create present-day problems and perhaps cause a great deal more suffering in order to comment on something, as tragic as it was, that happened 70 years ago, of which we are not historical scholars.

The Republic of Turkey today makes an important contribution to the success of the NATO Alliance and is a key country for support of United States strategic interests in Europe, Southwest Asia, and the Middle East. For example, the United States has access to military facilities in Turkey that play a major role in common defense, and not simply against the Soviet threat which is now altering before our very eyes, but also in the key position that relates to the Middle East where we are going to continue to have very important interests for years to come. These facilities in Turkey include air bases for deployment of United States forces, logistic depots, and vital intelligence collection facilities.

If anyone thinks that we can monitor arms control agreements in this modern period of time on conventional or strategic forces without having friends in that part of the world, they simply have not been involved in intelligence and have not been involved in national security matters in very much detail.

I believe we must avoid unnecessary harm to our relationship with Turkey, particularly at a time when the threat to our strategic interests in that region of the world is in flux and probably will remain so for some time to come.

I, therefore, again commend the Senator from West Virginia for taking this position. It is not one that is going to be popular with many people in the United States who are focusing on this issue because not many people are focusing on this issue, and perhaps they should be. It is not one that is going to gain the Senator from West Virginia many votes in his home State, probably none. But it is an important matter for the security of our country.

Too often there are no Senators who take enough time and who are willing to put in the effort to study a matter like this to understand the sensitivity, to understand the impact that a resolution like this can have on very important American relationships that indeed could involve our own security in the years to come.

I have watched the Senator from West Virginia because I have been with him on the floor of this Senate, I have been with him on the Armed Services Committee, I have been with him when he was majority leader, and I have been with him on trips to NATO. He has studied this situation and I will venture that he knows more about this matter right now than anyone else in this Congress, because he has that kind of diligence when he goes into a problem.

I know he has been to Greece and he has been to Turkey and he has paid a great deal of attention to the southern flank of NATO, and I know he also recognizes the intelligence aspect in our relationship. I know that he is very well aware of the importance of being able to monitor a geographic location and also of the relationship between being able to successfully monitor activities in that part of the world and whether we can afford to enter into arms control agreements and cut back our own forces pursuant to those agreements.

So I commend the Senator from West Virginia for his leadership role here.

I have no idea where the votes are. I do not know whether there will be a successful cloture vote on Thursday or on the second vote, but I do know that the Senator from West Virginia is doing the Nation's business, that he is taking care of the Nation's security. I commend him for that, and he will have my support as long as this debate lasts because he is right in our national security perspective and right from the point of view of what is in the best interests of America.

Frankly, although some may not recognize it, I think he is right in not bringing this historical matter, as tragic as it was, to the current situation in a way that could be tragic in itself.

So I think from all of those points of view the Senator from West Virginia is serving this body well. He knows the Senate rules. He knows the security interests of our country. He places our security interests before any other consideration. And I commend him for it.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN] for his eloquent statement in opposition to the resolution.

The Duke of Wellington said that he considered the presence of Napoleon on the field to be equal to 40,000 men. I consider the presence of Senator SAM NUNN on the floor on this question to be very important and weighty indeed.

I have said many times, and I certainly do not mind saying again and again, that when it comes to national security matters, defense matters, military matters, there is none in this Chamber who is a peer, the equal to Senator SAM NUNN of Georgia. And there are some very highly qualified experts indeed on this floor when the Chamber is full qualified to speak on military matters.

Senator SAM NUNN is superior, in my judgment, to any other Senator in the field of military security. And that is because he has applied himself to his job. One of Benjamin Franklin's favorite passages from the Scripture was: "Seeth thou a man diligent in his business? He shall stand before kings."

Senator SAM NUNN is diligent in his business and that is why we all respect him and have faith in what he says. I have had, perhaps, in some ways the unequaled opportunity to sit on this floor and see two great Senators from Georgia, one right after the other, almost, as it were, who were great leaders in this Senate, who were great leaders in the area of armed services.

When I came here 31 years ago, Senator Richard Russell was the man who sat right at this desk and who, when he spoke, attracted the ears, the minds, and the faith of other Senators about him. He spoke on military matters as the calm, coolheaded, levelheaded sage of the Senate, and people listened.

He was the chairman, as I say, of the Armed Services Committee, later the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and later the President pro tempore of the Senate. He died on January 21, 1971. I admired Senator Russell, and it was I who offered the resolution to name the old Senate office building the Richard Brevard Russell Building.

I predict that here is a man who is certainly equal, and equals today, in the minds of many of us, the great mind of Richard B. Russell when it comes to military matters.

I am grateful for the support of Senator NUNN. This resolution before the Senate does not matter one whit to me insofar as votes are concerned. I have no sizable Turkish constituency. And as I said on yesterday, if there are a dozen Turkish Americans in West Virginia, I do not know the name of one of them.

So, as far as politics are concerned, I will probably lose on this one. But that is not the point: We are Senators. We are supposed to give our best judgment and exercise our best judgment, and certainly in matters that affect our national interest.

I talked to a good many Senators about this resolution. Some have said, "Well, I have an Armenian constituency in my State. They are small but they are active politically, and I promised them I would be for the resolution and be for cloture." I can understand that.

I am in a difficult position. If any Armenians who may have listened to what I have said may be constrained to feel that I am anti-Armenian, that is not the case at all. I do not know whether I have any Armenians in West Virginia or not, but that is not the point.

I admire the man who keeps his word, but I admire even more greatly the man who commits his word and then who finds out that he is wrong, if he finds out he is wrong, and in the face of additional facts that constrain him to believe other than he believed when he made the commitment, I admire the man who has the courage and the intellectual honesty to say: "I was wrong, and I cannot keep a mistaken commitment. I am sorry, but I just cannot keep it. I only saw through a glass darkly, as did the apostle Paul, when I made that commitment. I see things otherwise today." Like the worm that crawled upon the clod of dirt, he saw the world; and the squirrel who climbed the tree saw the world; the eagle from the highest mountain saw the world; each saw a different world.

So there are commitments we make at times that we will keep even though we felt like we were wrong at the time. But when they are momentous and can be of considerable magnitude in the scales of the interests of these United States, then I say it is time to take a new look and to come down on the side of our country.

Politics is one thing; patriotism is another. So I thank my friend, Senator NUNN, for what he has said. He said as much in 10 minutes as I said in an hour and a half. Because he is who he is, chairman of the Armed Services Committee and one who speaks carefully, thoughtfully and who, when he speaks, other people listen.

So, I have been rather desultory and wandering in my remarks, but my heart is there.

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. President, I rise to join the distinguished President pro tempore of the Senate, Senator BYRD, in opposition to the resolution offered by the distinguished Republican leader and others. While the issue being debated here is certainly not a burning issue for most Americans, the events of 1915-23 raised by Senate Joint Resolution 212 are of deep emotional importance to many people, Armenians and Turks alike.

Despite the emotions that are involved in this, Mr. President, I think what we have to do is step back and take a dispassionate approach. In doing so, any kind of a careful dispassionate approach would lead one to believe, I feel, that this resolution would be ill-advised for a variety of reasons.

First, as has been clearly outlined by the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee, we cannot ignore the extraordinarily important role that Turkey plays in Western defense. The chairman of the committee asked me to spend a good deal of time last year looking at the southern flank of NATO, coming to understand many of the issues there. You cannot come away with anything but the very deep impression of the commitment the Turks have made.

Turkey has been a bulwark, and a very important one for us, against Soviet expansion for a long, long time and has certainly been an extraordinarily staunch friend of the United States. I think this relationship between the United States and Turkey may well be the most undervalued relationship that we have anywhere in the world today. I think passing the resolution in front of us would only do very severe harm to that special, important and, unhappily, undervalued relationship.

If you look at a map, Mr. President, Turkey lives in a very, very unfriendly neighborhood. If you look at what goes on around Turkey, surrounded by Syria, Iraq, Iran, the Soviet Union, Bulgaria, in addition to their NATO ally Greece going to the West. If you look at that neighborhood Mr. President, it is not exactly Mr. Rogers' neighborhood. It is a very tough place to survive.

Turkey has done so with a force for stability that has been very important to much of the world. Turkey shares the Islamic faith with her Arab and Persian neighbors but has stood at the same time against the kind of fundamentalist pressures coming out of that part of the world that have consumed the passions of so many people there. It is remarkable to me, looking at that region, what a stable force this has been.

I might add also that one only has to go a little south from Turkey down the Mediterranean coast to understand that Turkey is not only important to our security, but important to the security of Israel as well.

The distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Senator NUNN, described very well our defense establishment and our relationship with the Turkish military, which is, of course, among one of the most important that we have. They have the longest border of any NATO country with the U.S.S.R. They defend 37 percent of the land territory of NATO in Europe and maintain the largest army in NATO outside the United States and, perhaps most important, they control that extraordinarily important strait, which is the choke point for Soviet naval operations in the Mediterranean.

Of course, our relationship with the Soviet Union is changing. But, goodness knows what is going to happen down the line and I think we ought to continue to maintain our concern for our national security interests and overall stability in that region.

Given the importance of Turkey to our national security and the ongoing relationship that we have under the defense and economic agreement with that nation, it seems to me that it is increasingly clear that we should not needlessly antagonize Turkey.

Second, beyond the military relationship, I do not think that it is appropriate at all for this body to get into an intense historic dispute. The genocide charge is a hotly contested one and I think immediately the assumption is: "Something happened; the Turks were guilty; the Armenians were the ones wronged in this situation." That I think, has been the conventional wisdom.

In preparing for this, Mr. President, however, I discovered, to my surprise, that there is a very significant division and a great deal of scholarship about the charges of genocide. The issues, given this division, are certainly better left to historians and not to politicians and governing bodies like the U.S. Senate.

The relevant documents in the Ottoman archives are being made accessible to researchers. That commitment that has been made by the Turkish Government. The Turkish Government has responded to calls for these documents and has invested significant resources into cataloging 4 centuries of archives relating to the Armenians. All documents are available for review by scholars, although only documents through 1895 have so far been catalogued. This process is ongoing. I think the Turkish Government has certainly been forthcoming on this front.

Let me read you a quote from Mr. Heath W. Lowry, who is the editor and cofounder of the Journal of Ottoman Studies, executive director of the Institute of Turkish Studies, an educational foundation originally endowed by the Turkish Government but managed by an independent board, including prominent American scholars. Mr. Lowry wrote the following:

> What did happen in 1915? Four years ago, the majority of American academic experts on late Ottoman history declared their opposition to another Armenian genocide resolution. Specifically, those 69 scholars wrote: "The weight of evidence so far uncovered points in the direction of serious inter-communal warfare (perpetrated by Moslem and Christian irregular forces), complicated by disease, famine, suffering and massacres." They appealed to the Turkish political authorities to open the relevant Ottoman archives, which have been classified since 1914, so that they could "identify the causes for the events which resulted in the death or removal of large numbers of the Eastern Anatolian population, Christian and Moslem."

Mr. President, here are 69 distinguished American scholars saying let us sit back and look at what truly happened in this situation. I am not about to suggest that I can substitute my judgment for that of a number of very well trained historians.

Third, while the terrorism which has been endemic to this issue for the last 15 years is supported by only a tiny fraction of the Armenian community, we cannot ignore it. It is one reason why the resolution is so very sensitive a matter in Turkey. Seventy-three people, many of them Turkish diplomats, have been killed since 1973 in the name of avenging Armenian dead; 467 have been wounded and 4 of the killings, Mr. President, were right here in the United States.

I think that is further evidence that this resolution will just inflame passions more in an area where we should be seeking calm. Armenians and Azaris of Turkish dissent have fought pitched battles in the Transcaucasus. Soviet troops have been mobilized to intevene as these age-old ethnic passions boil over again.

Let us not throw more fuel onto that fire. This area of the world has too much hatred now. There is every reason for the United States to avoid further inflaming these passions. Consideration and adoption of this resolution, Mr. President, would run exactly counter to this goal. The U.S. Senate should not become a vehicle for reopening old wounds and igniting smoldering hatreds.

This whole approach was very well outlined by the distinguished senior Senator from West Virginia yesterday. While this resolution cannot change the past, it may well bring grave damage to our relations in a critical region of the world. All of us clearly have the deepest sympathy for the Armenians who suffered in the years 1915 to 1923 but this resolution is not the answer, and I oppose its consideration.

I thank the distinguished Senator from West Virginia for his leadership on this issue. I hope the Senate does, in all of its wisdom, discuss this issue. But, let us leave it at that and not further exacerbate problems that already exist in a difficult region of the globe, and certainly one, as the distinguished Senator from West Virginia knows, is not going to become easier in the future. It is going to become more difficult, more explosive and more unstable. Let us not contribute to that with what we do on the Senate floor. I thank the distinguished Senator for yielding.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. WIRTH], for his very cogent, lucid, well-thought-out remarks in opposition to the resolution. He is a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, a former Member of the House of Representatives and his opinion carries great weight in the area of which he has spoken, the area of national security and military affairs. I thank him for his timely observations.

Mr. President, may I ask if the distinguished Republican leader wishes to have the floor. If he does, I will be happy to yield it for ever so long as he wishes.

Mr. DOLE. Fine. I would like to speak.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield now to the distinguished Republican leader for whatever time he may wish to consume, and that I be permitted to resume the floor when the distinguished minority leader yields it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Republican leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from West Virginia. I thank my colleagues. I thank those who participated in the debate yesterday. I will be responding to the 69 scholars' argument here a little later, blow that out of the water. There were not 69 scholars on the genocide period, only about 4. But in any event, we will come to that later.

I want to thank my colleagues who joined in debate to support my resolution, Senators PRESSLER, LEVIN, WILSON, SIMON, and PELL, yesterday. I expect that others will join today's debate in support of the resolution. I also want to commend the distinguished President pro tempore, Senator BYRD. As usual, he spoke his mind with clarity, conviction, and effect. As he has indicated, we do disagree on this issue, but I have the greatest respect for his sincerity and for his effectiveness as an opponent.

I would make one observation. So far at least, it seems the distinguished Senator from West Virginia has been doing most of the heavy lifting on that side. I hope there will be other Members who will be coming over to speak soon. Senator BYRD is an army by himself, so even if we get a lot of people on this side, he may not be outnumbered. I am not certain.

We have just had the distinguished Senator from Colorado express his views. I hope we have a good debate from people on each side of the issue. I think if we have the time—and I think we will have the time—once we get on the resolution itself, we can change some minds around this place.

Yesterday, I make some comment about Turkish lobbyists. I did not mean lobbyists from Turkey. I meant American lobbyists who are working for Turkey. The Senator from West Virginia said he had never seen a Turkish lobbyist. I do not know if we have met a Turkish lobbyist, but I have met a lot of Americans who are lobbying for Turkey.

I think sooner or later we are going to vote—I hope sometime tomorrow—on the motion to proceed. I cannot say that I have 60 votes. I should have 100 votes on this issue. I think there is going to be a sizable number for this Senator, a sizable number of votes for Senator BYRD. So it seems to me for those who will be voting yes or no, It would be very helpful if they would come to the floor.

First I would make a small but important point. In response to remarks that I made saying threats had been made by opponents of the resolution, the Senator from West Virginia said he had not heard of any threats. But I remind the Senate that this Senator also included in his statement what we all know, that Turkey has already retaliated against us for just our consideration of this resolution.

I would also inform the Senate that President Ozal indicated to me—and I do not know whether to characterize it as a threat or not. I am not casting any aspersions on him—he was quite clear—he indicated to me that further positive action on the resolution would lead Turkey to take additional actions in terms of our bilateral relations.

I know of one Senator at least, maybe there are others, who has been threatened with loss of important business to companies in his State. So at least there have been strong representations made.

As I said yesterday, this is sort of David and Goliath. You have this small country of Armenia which has been wracked by earthquakes, 50,000 dead, 500,000 homeless, a country of 3.5 million. They do not have any strength at all. But we have, I think, a sense of fairness in this body. We have upheld time after time human rights actions, and that is what this really is all about. People may say: "Oh, well we certainly do not want to harm our relations with the Turks. "But we are talking about the Ottomans, not the modern Turkish Republic. And keep in mind, they were on the side of the Germans. They were not helping us in World War I.

As I said yesterday, there was no effort or attempt to in any way implicate the Republic of Turkey. So I would hope that we understand—as it would be a sign of maturity in this democracy of Turkey if they would accept, as Germany accepted—the fact of the Holocaust.

I might also add that, as I tried to say yesterday, some were saying this is an inducement for terrorism by so-called Armenian extremists. I reject that argument. A respected scholar named Susan Blair, who was a principal researcher and editor of the book titled The Slaugherhouse Province, which makes a compelling case that there was, indeed, an Armenian genocide, received a death threat upon the recent publication of her book. I have no idea, and neither do the police, who made the threat, but it reminds us again that there are extremists in every community and we must join together to condemn their acts, whatever, their motive, whether they be Armenians, Turks, Americans, whatever.

Let me speak to some other arguments that have been raised. At one point the distinguished Senator from West Virginia said: "The Senate should not be the vehicle for reopening old wounds."

Mr. President, as I said, I deeply respect my friend, the Senator from West Virginia, but I think in this case he has it backwards. Action on this resolution will not open old wounds. For the millions of Armenians around the globe, including nearly 1 million in this country, the wounds have been open for almost 75 years, and they remain open. They have not been closed. The hurt has not been able to heal because the world has not faced up to the truth of the suffering of the Armenian people in this period from 1915 to 1923.

As the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN] pointed out yesterday, it may have been because the world stood by and did nothing so far as the Armenians were concerned that led to the Holocaust and the genocide that started against the Jews in Germany in 1939.

Constructing a Holocaust memorial museum does not keep open old wounds of the Nazi genocide against European Jews. It helps the world close those wounds, and is a part of a renewed determination we can never let another genocide occur.

Writing about, and speaking about, and remembering the Cambodian genocide does not keep open old wounds, but causes us to remember the hundreds of thousands of innocent victims of the Khmer Rouge, and again reinforces our determination to stamp out the threat of genocide wherever it threatens to recur.

Mr. President, ignoring the fact of Armenian genocide does not reopen old wounds. Dealing with it straightforwardly with this resolution can start the process of closing those old wounds. We are never going to heal them if we keep our heads in the sand, and fail to open up the doors and let in a little ventilation.

It is said that if we act on this resolution, it is going to spur ethnic tensions, especially those which are so manifest today in Armenia and Azerbaijan. So we ought to lay off the resolution. The Senate should not act. The present situation is just too tense and too sensitive. And somebody pointed out, to buttress the argument the ongoing tensions. There are ongoing tensions, between the Turks and Bulgarians, Serbs and Croatians, and the Armenians and the Azerbaijanis. The distinguished Senator from West Virginia made the same points in his opening remarks today.

I would again say that wherever we have had a very sensitive situation—and some have argued we should not act on these things because it might stir up tensions—we have usually taken action in the Senate of the United States.

In fact amendment No. 279 to the fiscal 1990 Foreign Relations Authorization Act was an amendment to condemn Bulgaria for its vicious attacks on the expulsion of ethnic Turks. One of the very instances cited by the Senator from West Virginia as evidence that the situation in that region is too sensitive for us to act.

I think the vote was 99 to zero. I voted for it. It was a worthwhile amendment. I supported the Turks. The amendment was offered by a most respected Member of this body, the Senator from West Virginia. The amendment was not dealing with a matter that was too sensitive. Someone could have said: "Do not deal with that, it is too sensitive there are ethnic problem the Bulgarnians and the Turks." As I said, the vote was 99 to zip. Everybody present voted for the resolution.

The record on other issues is the same. They are very sensitive—no doubt about it. They are sensitive. But they are important because they deal with human life, and human rights, and human conflicts between people of vastly different cultural and political values. That is why they are sensitive. And that is exactly why the Senate has chosen to deal with them.

So in my view, this is an appropriate debate. Some said: "Why do you not deal with today's problems? Why are you worrying about something that happened 75 years ago?" As I said yesterday, I heard that same argument when we finally acted on the Genocide Convention which had been languishing in the Senate for 38 years.

As the Senator from West Virginia pointed out, this Senator was majority leader when we passed that convention, ratified it, and he was majority leader when they did the enabling legislation. We both believed that we had waited too long, 30-some years before we acted in the U.S. Senate.

So it was important we reach back, as we did in 1986 and 1988, and it is important that we discuss now this resolution. We cannot duck the tough, sensitive issues. I think we ought to deal straightforwardly with the Armenian genocide.

The Senator from Georgia, I think, referred earlier to the strategic importance of Turkey. There is doubt about it. I made the same statement myself, have been to Turkey, and I have visited with the then president and prime minister, now the president. I am certainly aware of the strategic role Turkey plays in the southern flank of NATO. I know about its border. I know its importance with reference to Iran and the Soviet Union, the fact that we have bases there and will have base negotiations soon. The fact is to quote one speaker, that it is also "important to Israel," and other similar observations. Turkey is important to the United States. No one doubts the importance of it.

But I want to remind the Senate of what I said yesterday. The importance of Turkey cuts two different ways. Sure, Turkey is important it to the United States, but I think we are equally important to Turkey. Sometimes there is a feeling around this place that you cannot disagree with your friends because they might not like it. We can disagree with each other, and we are friends. But we cannot disagree with some country even though they ought to be disagreed with—because, oh, that is too sensitive.

The United States has never made the facts of the 1915-1923 period an issue in its U.S. Turkish relations and the reason is simple. Those events, in our view, have nothing to do with the modern Turkish Republic, with the current Turkish Government, or the contemporary Turkish people. It is the Turkish Government which insists on making this a live, all too bitter bilateral issue. We do not see our action as anti-Turkey. We say that. We mean it. Why does Turkey insist on taking it that way? Why does Turkey insist on making a crisis out of a commemorative resolution? It is not necessary.

I have said time and time again that I am willing to work with the administration, with the Turkish Embassy, anybody, to try to find language that does not offend but still states some facts. Oh, you can write something that does not offend. Just leave out Turkey. That will not offend anybody in Turkey. Leave out the word "genocide" or any reference to the word "genocide."

I understand some believe there is no compromise. I would also indicate that if the argument we are hearing from some today is accurate, I guess they just did not hear the argument we made when we were talking about the Chinese student issue, because that was sort of the argument then used by some of us about the strategic importance of the People's Republic of China.

We all heard all sorts of outrage expressed about China, about the gross human rights abuses of the Chinese Government, the government killed thousands of people. We heard the outrages. They were pouring forth for hours.

Time and time again during the debate I heard my colleagues on the other side of that issue say what happened in Tiananmen Square is a matter of right and wrong, not strategic importance. The fact that there are 1.1 billion people in China did not make any difference. The fact China might be an offset to the Soviet Union did not make any difference. "We are talking about right and wrong." They said it again and again.

The majority leader this morning indicated that China's people comprised nearly a quarter of the world's population. But what was the argument? We cannot let the importance of China stand in the way of Senate action on an issue of right and wrong. That is the issue here today, right or wrong. That was the veiw they held about China. It was a human rights disaster. We do not know how many were killed, how many were jailed, how many are still in jail. But compared to what happened in Armenia, in a period of 1915 to 1923, there is no comparison. Almost an entire nation of people were wiped out. It was not a tragedy. It was genocide.

So I would guess there is a question of right and wromg here. That is really what we are debating here, what happened in the Ottoman Empire between 1915 and 1923.

Listen to what the majority leader decried in his statement on China this morning. And let me say he is right to decry. These are his words:

Political and other extrajudicial killing, torture, or other inhuman, degrading treatment or punishment, arbitrary arrests, detention, exile, excessive force in violation of humanitarian law in internal conflicts.

Again he was right to decry those gross violations of human rights. But every one of those charges can be made and proved a thousandfold against the authorities of the Ottoman Empire.

Let us make it clear. If we are going to have one set of rules for the People's Republic of China, and another set of rules for Turkey, maybe another set of rules for some country somewhere in the Mideast, and another set of rules for some other country, then I am not certain by what kind of a standard we are going to judge human rights abuses.

So if we should speak out against the current Chinese Government—and we should—how can you make a case that we cannot raise our voice about the Ottoman Empire and the crimes committed by the leaders of the Ottoman Empire, committed against an entire nation of people, and to boot by a government long since relegated to the trash can of history? Is China strategically important or not? Most people would say yes. Turkey is strategically important. Okay. Everybody will stipulate that. But it does not make sense to apply one standard to one country, and a different standard to another country.

Mr. President, I want to respond to the argument just made about the 69 scholars. That has a nice sound to it. All you have to do is tell people, well, we have 69 scholars to back up the case of the Turks. We want to make a record. So whatever the vote may be, the record will be here. This issue will not go away.

The inference is that 69 or a majority of U.S. or leading scholars challenge the genocide. In 1985 the American Turkish Association ran a newspaper ad, questioning whether the Armenians actually suffered a genocide and calling for the opening of the Ottoman Archives. We have a copy of the Ottoman what are now sent to be the Ottoman archives. I am showing you what the Ottoman archives is. It does not take long to leaf through it. The last entry is in 1894. The self-described Ottoman archives are right here. It has a letter which accompanies it. It is from the Center of Cultural Publication and Distribution from Turkey:

I am pleased to present to you and your staff a new release of our foundation entitled "Ottoman Archives, Collection, the Armenian Question."

As you are well aware, the repeated allegations of some Armenian interests in the U.S. is that a genocide occurring during the period of 1915 to 1923 has caused this mundane issue to be considered in the Congress numerous times during the last few years. S.J. Res. 212 is a most recent attempt on this issue. Historians repeatedly indicated that in the absence of clear, specific evidence which substantiates such an allegation, it would be an attempt to rewrite history on distorted facts on which the U.S. Congress should not be expected to play a role.

Our foundation took this professionalism as a mandate and started an expensive multiyear project to publish the original Ottoman Archives of the Middle East Institute, the first volume which is presented to you today, and 14 additional volumes are coming.

When? Thi· goes to 1894.

I placed in the RECORD yesterday—no one has refuted it, as far as I know—a report about the archives, and about what may be remaining to see, and about all the other archives in Germany and the United States and the Vatican; I read excerpts from Turkish papers that the Turks have been spending years taking out any part of the archives that might have an adverse impact. So this is volume 1, up to 1894. Fourteen more volumes are coming—but long after the debate on this particular issue will have ended. It's planned that way.

Let me get back to the 69 scholars, leading scholars. Of the 69, only 4 actually focus their studies on the historical period of the genocide: Stanford Shaw and his Turkish wife, Ezal Kural Shaw, their former student, Justin McCarthy, and Philip Stoddard, director of the Middle East Institute; all are financially subsidized by Turkey. Their work is routinely and roundly criticized by other scholars, who say none has credibility on the issue.

The other 64 signatories specialize in the areas of general history, Turkish language, Islamic carpets, architecture, political science, anthropology, and Turkish folklore. That does not exactly mean they are experts on genocide.

Since 1985 this ad has never reappeared, and the signatories have not responded to calls from Armenian historians to discuss the issue. After the ad ran, the Armenian Assembly contacted many of the signatories. In private some claimed they had not authorized use of their names and some readily acknowledged the Armenians suffered genocide. We have excerpts from some of the letters.

Bernard Lewis from Princeton signed the ad, and because he is well known, took on a special role in the Senate debate on the resolution. However, Lewis' prior work establishes his lack of credibility as a "69 scholars" signatory.

In his seminal book "The Emergence of Modern Turkey," Lewis actually wrote that the Armenians suffered "the terrible holocaust of 1915, where a million and a half Armenians perished." That is his language, not mine.

None of the 69 has ever acknowledged the overwhelming primary evidence of the genocide—that is, hundreds of unimpeachable international eyewitnesses; boastful admissions by Ottoman Government officials; the obvious fact that an entire race was removed from its homeland; incriminating Ottoman documents; United States, British, German, Austrian, Italian, French, Soviet, and other dispositive archival records; and the postwar trial and convictions for "exterminating the Armenian nation." It has been suggested that maybe some of those who did sign did so as the price of continued access to resources in Turkey.

I ask unanimous consent to have material printed in the RECORD which contains statements and the retractions, in some cases, and information on many of those who supposedly signed an ad in 1985 as "69 scholars." Let me remind you that 10 U.S. Presidents, Ronald Reagan, Jimmy Carter, Herbert Hoover, Warren G. Harding, Woodrow Wilson, William Howard Taft, Theodore Roosevelt, William McKinley, Grover Cleveland, and Benjamin Harrison, all spoke of the tragedy of the Armenians.

I have a list of the scholars and their affiliation and their specialization and their area of expertise, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the appropriate point. I have copies of resolutions previously addressed in the Congress of the United States, and to include in the RECORD at this point a paper about how, over the years, a number of my colleagues in the Senate, Republicans and Democrats, have generally in the month of April, sometime around the 24th of April, which is the anniversary date, made statements in support of the so-called Armenian position.

I ask unanimous consent also to have printed at this point a listing of those Senators who have made statements over the years. Also the statement by the late Senator Scoop Jackson, which I will discuss at some length later, which addresses the strategic importance of Turkey, which he recognized, but also the question of right or wrong, which he recognized.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

69 OR A "MAJORITY" OF U.S. OR LEADING SCHOLARS CHALLENGE THE GENOCIDE

Issue: In 1985, the American Turkish Association ran a newspaper ad questioning whether the Armenians actually suffered a genocide and called for the opening of the Ottoman Archives. This ad has become one of the most often used weapons against the genocide resolution—opponents argue that if 69 scholars dispute the genocide, Congress should not legislate it into history. In fact, this ad has little substance and no value as a statement of credible scholars.

POINTS AND AUTHORITIES

1. Of the sixty-nine, none are recognized in genocide studies and only four actually focus their studies on the historical period of the genocide: Stanford Shaw, his Turkish wife Ezal Kural Shaw, their former student Justin McCarthy, and Phillip Stoddard, Director of the Middle East Institute. All four are financially subsidized by Turkey, their work is routinely and roundly criticized by other scholars, and none has credibility on this issue.

2. The other 64 signatories specialize in the areas of history, Turkish language, Islamic carpets, architecture; political science, anthropology, and Turkish folklore.

3. Since 1985, this ad has never reappeared and the signatories have not responded to calls from Armenian historians to discuss the issue.

4. After the ad ran, the Armenian Assembly contacted the signatories. In private some claimed that they had not authorized use of their names and some readily acknowledged the Armenians suffered a genocide. In writing, we received letters, excerpted in the attachment.

5. Bernard Lewis, from Princeton, signed the ad and, because he is well-known, has taken on a special role in the Senate debate on the resolution. However, Lewis' prior work establishes his lack of credibility as a "69 scholars" signatore. In his seminal book, "The Emergence of Modern Turkey," Lewis actually wrote that the Armenians suffered "the terrible holocaust of 1915, where a million and a half Armenians perished." (Note, the term "holocaust" is usually reserved for the unique Jewish experience during World War II.)

6. None of the sixty nine has ever distinguished or even acknowledged the overwhelming primary evidence of the genocide—i.e., hundreds of unimpeachable international eyewitnesses; boastful admissions by Ottoman government officials; the obvious fact that an entire race was removed from its homeland; incriminating Ottoman documents; U.S., British, German, Austrian, Italian, French, Soviet, and other dispositive archival records; and the post-war trials and convictions for "exterminating the Armenina nation."

7. Finally, it is clear that many of those who did sign their names did so as the price of continued access to resources in Turkey. Turkish sources confirm that cooperation with the government pays high dividends and criticism exacts a high price. Recently, an Armenian-American obtained a rare copy of the Turkish Official Gazette recording the post war trials; he offered it to Cornell Fleischer at Washington University in St. Louis for the school's Ottoman materials. Initially, Fleischer agreed to accept the copies if there were no publicity, but then refused to accept them in fear of the Turkish government's reaction if it heard. As another example, in a more recent edition of Lewis's book, he has edited out his previous statement on the Armenian holocaust.

AMERICAN ACADEMICIANS AND LOBBYING ON THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE RESOLUTION

INTRODUCTION

"The political control of knowledge goes deeper than censorship and is more subtle than outright propaganda. It includes the conditions under which research will be funded and given a forum, and also the designation of legitimacy to be conferred or withheld in specific fields of inquiry. Jobs, tenure, professional advancement, all can come to depend on taking the approved line.

"Adjacent to these disturbing developments in the academy, the high-pressure phenomenon of the 'institute' and 'think tank' proliferates, with, in most cases, government backing of one sort or another. What all this scrambling means, finally, is that the struggle of memory against forgetting must compete with official versions and special interests, with public and private demands for serviceable knowledge, with the kinds of on-line information geared to expedient needs. Amid this din the scholar's independent voice is hard to hear, unless, of course, it too is 'backed.'"—Terrence Des Pres, Professor of English, Colgate University, Member of the United States Holocaust Council.

In 1985, 69 American academicians became part of a lobbying effort organized by the Assembly of Turkish American Associations to defeat congressional approval of a resolution to commemorate the Armenian Genocide.

The scholars, who hailed from such prestigious institutions as Columbia University and the University of Chicago, signed their names to an advertisement that ran in The New York Times, The Washington Post, and The Washington Times. The advertisement, which was directed at members of the U.S. House of Representatives, characterized language in the House Resolution, H.J. Res. 192, as "misleading and/or inaccurate."

Since 1985, some of the scholars have privately expressed regret that they ever signed the ad. Others have seemingly contradicted the conclusions of the ad in correspondence on the topic with the Armenian Assembly of America.

Dr. Bernard Lewis, a professor at Princeton University, was even found to have acknowledged the massacre of the Armenians in one of his books, "The Emergence of Modern Turkey." Lewis wrote that at the beginning of the 19th century a desperate struggle began between the Turks and the Armenians, "a struggle between two nations for the possession of a single homeland, that ended with the terrible holocaust of 1915, where a million and half Armenians perished."

The 1985 ad illustrates how academicians can become players, wittingly or unwittingly, in a shrewd political manuever. To date, Turkish government officials and Turkish organizations in the United States continue to use this ad as a tool in a far-reaching campaign to convince American political leaders and the American people that an Armenian Genocide in Turkey between 1915 and 1923 never occurred.

Terrence Des Pres wrote pointedly that scholarship today has become besieged by political pressures. One can only hope that the scholarly community will recognize the damaging effects of this type of pressure and move to reject similar tactics in the future.

AFFILIATIONS

Although 69 names appear under the ad, eleven have no current academic affiliation. Of the eleven, five are retired, one is with the Middle East Institute, one is with the Institute for Turkish Studies, and four are not affiliated with any institution.

Two specific examples of non-academics are Philip Stoddard and Elaine Smith, both former U.S. Foreign Service Officers. Mr. Stoddard was a Ford Foundation research fellow in Turkey from 1955 to 1957. He joined the U.S. State Department in 1963, working in intelligence research as Chief of the Greece-Turkey-Iran Division and went on to head the Near East Division. He is currently the Executive Director of the Middle East Institute in Washington, D.C.

Ms. Smith studies Turkish at the Foreign Service Institute in 1958 and 1959. In 1960, she was assigned as political officer to the U.S. Embassy in Ankara, Turkey, where she remained for nine years. After that, she was transferred to Istanbul, where she served another three years. She was later assigned in Washington, D.C. to the Department of Commerce.

AREAS OF EXPERTISE

All of the signatories of the ad have at some time studied, taught or written about some aspect of Turkey—history, anthropology, linguistics, literature, political science, or folklore.

But an analysis of their areas of expertise reveals a striking fact: of the 69 signatories, only 8 are concerned solely with the 20th century, the period encompassing the Armenian Genocide. Another 10 are scholars of the 19th and 20th centuries. Put together, only 26 percent of the signatories are scholars on the broad subject of pre-Republic Turkish history during the 19th and 20th centuries.

Closer analysis reveals that only 4 of the 18 scholars of the 19th and 20th century history have dealt with the specific topic and period of history in question, i.e. Turkish Ottoman policy towards the Armenians during and before World War I. These four are Philip Stoddard, Justin McCarthy, Ezel Kural Shaw and her husband, Stanford Shaw.

Of the remaining 14 scholars of 19th and 20th century Turkish history, 9 have dealt with issues peripheral to the Armenian theme, and five with topics irrelevant to Armenian issues. One example is Heath Lowry, the current director of the Institute of Turkish Studies in Washington, D.C. His area of expertise is the 16th century Ottoman Empire.

The remaining 74 percent of the signatories have dealt with various aspects of Turkish history, language and anthropology ranging from the 13th to the 18th centuries. Some of the scholars have been involved in such aspects of the Ottoman Empire as Arab affairs, Islamic carpets, and patronage of architecture.

TURKISH SUPPORT FOR RESEARCH

A significant number of the signatories of the ad have received fellowships and/or grants from pro-Turkish organizations to conduct their research. The two most active organizations were the Institute of Turkish Studies, headquartered in Washington, D.C., and the American Research Institute in Turkey, based in Ankara, Turkey.

In total, 40 of the scholars who signed the ad received a total of 65 grants from these two organizations. In addition, departments or universities with which those 40 scholars are affiliated have received more than 170 grants from pro-Turkish institutes. (See the attached chart for specific grants.)

THE SCHOLARS RESPOND

After publication of the ad, the Armenian Assembly wrote to the signatories to determine their personal views on the Armenian Genocide. Twelve of them responded and made the following points:

All 12 signatories agreed that archives everywhere, especially in Turkey, should be opened to all scholars.

Some objected to the U.S. Congress singling out the Armenians as an example of man's inhumanity to man, while ignoring the plight of Blacks and Indians.

One raised the concern of a damaged NATO alliance and possible disruption in U.S.-Turkish relations.

One expressed displeasure that the ad had been reprinted without his permission, and agreed with the resolution.

One decried blaming today's Turks for "what happened 70 years ago," but another noted that the Turkish public has not addressed the "victimization of the Armenians."

Following are excerpts from some of the letters. The names of the scholars have been withheld at their request.

"I am well familiar with the events of 1915-16 and with the events up to 1923 and I am aware of the death, suffering and massacres of the Armenian people during this period . . . I shall never become part of any attempt to deny the victimization, massacres, or genocide of the Armenian people perpetrated between 1915 and 1923."—June 11, 1985.

"Let me first say that I do not question that massive numbers of Armenians perished during World War I as a result of criminal and even genocidal intents. Whenever I teach courses on this period, I always devote these events specific attention. It is also my personal opinion that high Ottoman officials pursued policies that were aimed at the effective elimination of the Armenian population in Anatolia."

"It is also my opinion that the Turkish public—unlike the German public with regard to the Holocaust—has not yet forthrightly addressed the victimization of the Armenians during World War I. I believe that Turkish democracy will be much stronger when this has been accomplished."—June 14, 1985.

"You ask me what my understanding is of the treatment of Armenians during the period between 1915 and 1923 . . . I cannot authoritatively answer that question. First, that period is not the subject of my own scholarly expertise. Second . . . official Turkish archives of the period in question have not so far been opened for scholarly analysis."—June 14, 1985.

"I sincerely believe that hundreds of thousands of Armenians lost their lives in the 1915-1923 period. I have no doubt that the three upstarts who led the Empire up to 1918 had the capacity to give orders to murder Armenians qua Armenians."—July 3, 1985.

"As scholars, we acknowledge that there were terrible sufferings undergone by the Armenians at this time. To deny this would be unjust. Even the word 'genocide' is not wholly inappropriate here."—June 10, 1985.

THE U.S. HISTORICAL RECORD

Some 70 years after the terrible sufferings endured by the Armenians in Turkey, 69 scholars have urged Congress to oppose a resolution that would set aside a day to remember and reflect on those tragic events.

Nearly three-fourths of the signatories are not academicians of the historical period and topic in question, and many of them have received direct or indirect support for their academic research from the Republic of Turkey.

The signatories say that the archives of the Soviet Union, Syria, Bulgaria and Turkey must be opened to historians so that the events of 1915-23 can be "adequately known." But thousands of historical documents on the Armenian Genocide already exist in the archives of the United States. The tragic events of that period have been affirmed by several sources (See Fact Sheet #2 for specific citings):

Ten U.S. Presidents—Ronald Reagan, Jimmy Carter, Herbert Hoover, Warren G. Harding, Woodrow Wilson, William Howard Taft, Theodore Roosevelt, William McKinley, Grover Cleveland, and Benjamin Harrison.

Congressional resolutions adopted by the 54th and 66th Congresses.

Official files of U.S. consular reports from Ottoman Turkey, including the correspondence of U.S. Ambassador to the Ottoman Empire, Henry Morgenthau.

In light of this material, and much more documentation that can be found in the British, French and German archives, contemporary scholars have a wealth of information already at their disposal on the events of 1915-1923.

Richard Hovannisian, a renowned scholar of modern Armenian history, talks pointedly about the problems surrounding scholarly research into the Genocide in a new book titled "The Armenian Genocide In Perspective":

"Perhaps the main reason for the general disregard for scientific study was the feeling that there was neither need for, nor purpose in, dwelling upon that which the entire world accepted as common knowledge, that is, the systematic dislocation and annihilation of the Armenian population by a dictatorial regime bent on creating a radically different political order with a radically different ethnoreligious composition.

"With the humiliating but accurate phrase 'starving Armenian' broadcast the world over, the survivors would have found it unimaginable that within a generation there might be those who would either deny or else try to minimize the scope of their victimization by casting it into the context of the general horror and havoc of war. Ironically, however, that is exactly what happened. And with the great new international crises gripping the world in the 1930s and 1940s, the Armenian experience in World War I became the 'forgotten genocide.'"

While the evidence of the Armenian Genocide is incontrovertible, the Armenian community looks forward to increasing study of this subject to assist in the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide.

[From the Washington Times, Dec. 2, 1985]

ATTENTION MEMBERS OF THE U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Our reservations focus on the use of the words "Turkey" and "genocide" and may be summarized as follows:

From the fourteenth century until 1922, the area currently known as Turkey, or more correctly, the Republic of Turkey, was part of the territory encompassing the multi-national, multi-religious state known as the Ottoman Empire. It is wrong to equate the Ottoman Empire with the Republic of Turkey in the same way that it it wrong to equate the Hapsburg Empire with the Republic of Austria. The Ottoman Empire, which was brought to an end in 1922, by the successful conclusion of the Turkish Revolution which established the present day Republic of Turkey in 1923, incorporated lands and peoples which today account for more than twenty-five distinct countries in South-eastern Europe. North Africa, and the Middle East, only one of which is the Republic of Turkey. The Republic of Turkey bears no responsibility for any events which occurred in Ottoman times, yet by naming "Turkey" in the Resolution, its authors have implicitly labeled it as guilty of the "genocide" it charges transpired between 1915 and 1923.

As for the charge of "genocide:" No signatory of this statement wishes to minimize the scope of Armenian suffering. We are likewise cognizant that it cannot be viewed as separate from the suffering experienced by the Muslim inhabitants of the region. The weight of evidence so far uncovered points in the direction of serious intercommunal warfare (perpetrated by Muslim and Christian irregular forces), complicated by disease, famine, suffering and massacres in Anatolia and adjoining areas during the First World War. Indeed, throughout the years in question, the region was the scene of more or less continuous warfare, not unlike the tragedy which has gone on in Lebanon for the past decade. The resulting death toll among both Muslim and Christian communities of the region was immense. But much more remains to be discovered before historians will be able to sort out precisely responsibility between warring and innocent, and to identify the causes for the events which resulted in the death or removal of large numbers of the eastern Anatolian population, Christian and Muslim alike.

Statesmen and politicians make history, and scholars write it. For this process to work scholars must be given access to the written records of the statesmen and politicians of the past. To date, the relevant archives in the Soviet Union, Syria, Bulgaria and Turkey all remain, for the most part, closed to dispassionate historians. Until they become available the history of the Ottoman Empire in the period encompassed by H.J. Res. 192 (1915-1923) cannot be adequately known.

We believe that the proper position for the United States Congress to take on this and related issues, is to encourage full and open access to all historical archives, and not to make charges on historical events before they are fully understood. Such charges as those contained in H.J. Res. 192 would inevitably reflect unjustly upon the people of Turkey, and perhaps set back irreparably progress historians are just now beginning to achieve in understanding these tragic events.

As the above comments illustrate, the history of the Ottoman-Armenians is much debated among scholars, many of whom do not agree with the historical assumptions embodied in the wording of H.J. Res. 192. By passing the resolution Congress will be attempting to determine by legislation which side of a historical question is correct. Such a resolution based on historically questionable assumptions, can only damage the cause of honest historical enquiry, and damage the credibility of the American legislative process.

ARMENIAN ASSEMBLY OF AMERICA, FACT SHEET #2, U.S. RECOGNITION OF THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

During the second half of the nineteenth century, the Armenian population of the Ottoman Turkish Empire became the target of heightened persecution by the Ottoman government. These persecutions culminated in a three-decade period during which the Armenians were systematically uprooted from their homeland of 3,000 years and eliminated through massacres or exile.

Few events have evoked American sympathy and concern as did the Armenian Genocide in Ottoman Turkey. Eight U.S. Presidents spoke out against the treatment of the Armenians, and the 54th and 66th Congresses adopted resolutions deploring the massacres. In recent years, President Reagan, President Carter, the House of Representatives, and other officials reaffirmed American recognition of this tragedy.

U.S. REAFFIRMATION

President Ronald Reagan

Days of Remembrance of Victims of the Holocaust, Proclamation 4838, April 22, 1981.—"Like the genocide of the Armenians before it, and the genocide of the Cambodians which followed it—and like too many other such persecutions of too many other peoples—the lessons of the Holocaust must never be forgotten."

President Jimmy Carter

White House Ceremony, May 16, 1978.—"* * * it is generally not known in the world that in the years preceding 1916, there was a concerted effort made to eliminate all the Armenian people, probably one of the greatest tragedies that ever befell any group. And there weren't any Nuremberg trials."

President Herbert Hoover

The Memoirs of Herbert Hoover, 1952.—"The association of Mount Ararat and Noah, the staunch Christians who were massacred periodically by the Mohammedan Turks, and the Sunday School collections over fifty years for alleviating their miseries—all cumulate to impress the name Armenia on the front of the American mind."

President Warren G. Harding

Letter to Secretary of State Charles Evans Hughes, November 22, 1921.—"If it is believed that a warship can be sent to an Armenian port on the Mediterranean I should have very little hesitancy in making such a suggestion on behalf of these stricken people. Surely there must be some way in which to utter the admonition of the five great powers to restrain the hands of assassins in that unfortunate land."

President Woodrow Wilson

Letter to Acting Secretary of State William Phillips, September 18, 1919.—"* * * get into communication with * * * the appropriate committees of Congress with regard to our being authorized to send troops to Armenia. I am heartily in favor of such a course if the Congress will authorize it * * *"

President William Howard Taft

Taft Papers on the League of Nations, 1920.—"On the whole, it is not to much to say that the people of the Jewish race have suffered more in this war, as noncombatants, than any other people, unless it be the Serbians and the Armenians."

President Theodore Roosevelt

Letter to Cleveland Moadley Dodge, May 11, 1918.—"* * * the Armenian massacre was the greatest crime of the war, and failure to act against Turkey is to condone it * * * the failure to deal radically with the Turkish horror means that all talk of guaranteeing the future peace of the world is mischevious nonsense * * *"

Annual Message of the President, December 6, 1904.—"* * * it is inevitable that (the United States) should desire eagerly to give expression to its horror on an occasion like * * * such systematic and long-extended cruelty and oppression as the cruelty and oppression of which the Armenians have been the victims, and which have won for them the indignant pity of the civilized world."

President William McKinley

Annual Message of the President, December 5, 1898.—"* * * press for a just settlement of our claims * * * during the Armenian troubles of 1895 * * *"

President Grover Cleveland

Annual Message of the President, December 7, 1896.—"* * * it would afford me satisfaction if I could assure the Congress that the disturbed condition in Asiatic Turkey had durng the past year assumed a less hideous and bloody aspect and that * * * as a consequence of the awakening of the Turkish Government to the demands of humane civilization * * * the shocking features of the situation had been mitigated. Instead, however * * * we have been inflicted by continued and not unfrequent reports of the wanton destruction of homes and the bloody butchery of men, women, and children, made martyrs to their profession of Christian faith."

Annual Message of the President, December 2, 1895.—"Occurrences in Turkey have continued to excite concern. The reported massacres of Christians in Armenia and the development there and in other districts of a spirit of fanatic hostility to Christian influences naturally excited apprehension * * *"

President Benjamin Harrison

Letter to Robert J. Thompson, Esq., December 14, 1894.—"My indignation and sympathy have been greatly roused by the press reports of the fearful outrages practised on the Armenians."

House Joint Resolution 247

September 10, 1984.—"* * * April 24, 1985 is hereby designated as 'National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man' * * * for all victims of genocide, especially the one and one-half million people of Armenian ancestry who were victms of the genocide perpetrated in Turkey between 1915 and 1923 * * *"

House Resolution 148

April 8, 1974.—"* * * April 24, 1975 is hereby designated as 'National Day of Rememberance of Man's Inhumanity to Man' * * * for all victims of genocide, especially the one and one-half million people of Armenian ancestry who succumbed to the genocide perpetrated in 1915 * * *"

1983–87 Senator's Floor Statement on the Armenian Genocide

Issue: In recent years, before the Armenian Genocide Resolution was seriously pressed in the Senate, several Senators made floor statements commemorating April 24. A list of names and dates is attached.

POINTS AND AUTHORITIES

1. The statements of Senators Metzenbaum and Specter are interesting because they both switched sides in the October Judiciary Committee meeting.

2. Senator Scoop Jackson's statement is important because as a staunch supporter of national defense and NATO, he saw nothing wrong with commemorating the Armenian genocide.

SUPPORTING MATERIAL ATTACHED

[From the Congressional Record]

Armenian Genocide, 1915–23

Mr. Biden. Mr. President, the 19th and 20th centuries have been an era of nationalistic upheavals. In the name of nationhood or of a supposed greatness attached to a particular people, millions of human beings have suffered because their own ethnic background or religious beliefs did not conform to those of the ruling authority of the time.

A particularly cataclysmic instance of this occurred from 1915 through 1923, when the Ottoman Empire massacred an estimated 1.5 million Armenians living for the most part in Asia Minor. Whole villages were wiped out, thousands of individuals were deported, and countless others fled into the desert, where many perished from exposure or disease. The property was sequestered, and centuries of culture destroyed.

It has come to my attention that the August 1982 issue of the Department of State Bulletin carried a statement describing the record of the massacres as "ambiguous," and further declaring that "the Department of State does not endorse allegations that the Turkish Government committed a genocide against the Armenian people."

Mr. President, there is nothing "ambiguous" about the murder of 1.5 million human beings. The massacres were brutal, concerted, and blatantly systematic. There were numerous eyewitness accounts. Our own archives contain reports from Henry Morgenthau, our Ambassador in Constantinople from 1913 to 1916, who recounted direct conversations with Turkish Government officials who admitted the atrocities.

And I emphasize that this is not the same government that exists now. This was the aftermath of the Ottoman Empire.

Spokesmen for the State Department have promised for months to review and clarify the statement printed in the Bulletin. My hope is that Department officials will retract the statement and issue an explicit acknowledgement of the historical record of the genocide.

Throughout history, there have been too many examples of denials that events of such horrible dimensions have occurred, perhaps because their immensity is so incomprehensible or because rationalizations or intentional ignorance are the easier path to follow. In our own country, there have been those who have contended that slavery was beneficial to the blacks who lived under it. More recently, in the memory of many of those in this Chamber today, there have been denials that the Holocaust effected by Nazi Germany ever occurred. The revisionists are at work.

Today, there are elderly survivors of the genocide which took place in Armenia nearly 70 years ago. They still bear the emotional scars of those events, as do their descendants. Many Armenians throughout the world maintain the cultural traditions of their ancestors and venerate the memory of those who died at the hands of others not so very long ago.

No individual who values human life should ever forget this example of the ultimate danger of persecution. Though the events which I have spoken of today were regional, in a place far away, the conscience on the matter the conscience of the world must be global. I hope that my colleagues will join with me today in the annual commemoration of Armenian Martyrs Day, which is today.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE ARMENIAN MASSACRES

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, this past Sunday, April 24, marked the 68th anniversary of the massacre of nearly 1.5 million Armenians by the Turks between the years of 1915 and 1923. Today I offer my tribute to these early victims of 20th century genocide. The ill-fated Christian Armenians were repeatedly brutalized, having suffered attempts at wholesale annihilation during the Ottoman Empire and the rise of Kemal Ataturk. It is only fitting that this body pause to honor their memory on April 27, Armenian Martyrs Day.

Mr. President, the deportation, starvation, and horrible extermination sustained by innocent Armenians during these years are not the sole instances of man's incredible inhumanity to man in this blood-soaked region of the world. Yet, how ironic it is that these crimes were often committed by people who shared, or would soon share, the same persecution at the hands of a venomous majority.

How ironic that many of the participants in these compaigns of slaughter were Kurds, who were themselves an oppressed people yearning for self-determination. How equally ironic that many of the same Turks who perpetrated the genocidal acts against the Armenians would see their own descendants suffer similar massacres in Cyprus, while others would be objects of discrimination and scorn in several Western European cities, where Turks are an immigrant work force.

While a pitiful few learn from the vindictive turns of the wheel of history, let the U.S. Senate never be afraid to loudly decry acts of atrocity, wherever and whenever they are committed. Let not the Armenian holocaust be a mere occasion for commemoration, but rather let this day serve as a reaffirmation of America's intent to oppose tyranny with its every ounce of strength, and its equal intent to preserve freedom and the spirit of humanity.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, today the Senate commemorates the 68th anniversary of Armenian martyrs. Beginning in 1915, an estimated 1.5 million Armenians were killed, or died of disease and hunger, in an enforced dispersal and elimination of the Armenian population of the former Ottoman empire. Perhaps half a million survived by fleeing abroad.

This century has been great progress for the self determination of peoples, but the century has also seen unprecedented slaughter of whole ethnic identities. The Armenians we remember today were the first, tragically followed by the Nazi Holocaust that sought to exterminate the Jews, and in our day by the mass slaughter of Cambodians.

Today we must rededicate ourselves to work to insure that there is never another genocide, and that all nationalities have an opportunity to live in peace and security.

We pay special tribute to the Armenian national heritage, which continues to flourish, and to the Armenian Americans who have found a new home here, and so enriched our lives and communities in the United States.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, today I want to join a number of my fellow colleagues in paying homage to and recognizing the 68th anniversary of Armenian Martyrs Day.

Recently here in Washington there was a gathering of the survivors of the Jewish Holocaust. Their tragedy is something we as a nation and as a world cannot and must not forget. Yet all to often we do forget other such similar atrocities, the Armenian genocide especially.

As President Reagan stated so clearly in his proclamation issued on April 22, 1981, to proclaim April 26 to May 3 as "Days of Remembrance of Victims of Holocaust."

"Like the genocide of the Armenians before it, and the genocide of the Cambodians which followed it and like too many other such persecutions of too many other peoples—the lessons of the Holocaust must never be forgotten."

This is a solemn occasion for all of us who believe in human rights and in the goodness of man. It still is incomprehensible to me that 1.5 million Armenian men, women, and children were massacred in their own homeland. Yet it happened.

What is as mind boggling is that less than a quarter of a century later another holocaust took place. Now, some 60 years after the Armenian tragedy the world is still learning of the horrors of the Cambodian people endured under Pol Pot.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, April 24, 1983, marked the 67th anniversary of one of the most dreadful episodes in history: the massacre of more than 1 million Armenians in Turkey between 1915 and 1923. Because I believe there is value in reminding Americans of this period of atrocities, last week I introduced a resolution calling on the President to designate April 24, 1984, a day of remembrance for all victims of genocide, especially those of Armenian ancestry. However, today I rise to protest the August 1982 Department of State bulletin, which takes an official position that—

"The Department of State does not endorse allegations that the Turkish government committed a genocide against the Armenian people."

The Armenian genocide is a well-established historical fact. The genocide perpetrated against the the Armenian people must never be forgotten. It is imperative that we who value human life and dignity acknowledge such tragedies and strive to prevent them from happening again.

Regardless of short-term political consideration, the State Department should acknowledge the facts of the Armenian genocide. To do otherwise would set a precedent for other nations that tamper with their history for political advantage.

I am appalled by State Department's attempt to overlook the arrests, deportations, torture, and murder that occurred with the complicity of the Turkish Government in the early part of this century.

The State Department's position is unsatisfactory and inconsistent with President Reagan's Proclamation 4838, which states, in part:

"Like the genocide of the Armenians before it, and the genocide of the Cambodians which followed it—and like too many other such persecutions of too many other peoples—the lessons of the Holocaust must never be forgotten."

Further, the State Department's statement does a disservice to people of Armenian descent living in the United States and other countries. By compiling an accurate record of the facts of the past, these people can maintain a sense of ethic identity and alert future generations about evil in the past so as to avoid it in the future. The State Department is wrong to mislead these people regarding the atrocities committed against their ancestors. For these reasons, I strongly object to the action of the Department of State denying the part played by the Turkish Government in the Armenian genocide.

Mr. President, an article appeared in the New York Times Monday, April 15, 1983, expressing the sentiments of the Greek Government urging Turkish acknowledgement of the 1915 massacre. I ask that this article be printed in the Record.

The article follows:

"[From the New York Times, Monday, Apr. 25, 1983]

"POLITICIANS IN GREECE DEMAND TURKS ADMIT ARMENIAN DEATHS

"ATHENS, April 24 (Reuters).—Greek political parties from both the right and left called on Turkey today to acknowledge that as many as 1.5 million Armenians met death at the hands of Turks in 1915.

"Turkey has denied the charge in the face of extensive documentation.

"The party representatives were speaking at a meeting of more than 1,000 of Greece's 10,000 Armenians to mark the 68th anniversary of what historians say was a massacre by the Ottoman authorities during World War I."

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I rise today to join with my distinguished colleagues from Michigan, Senators Levin and Riegle, in commemorating the 68th anniversary of Armenian Martyrs Day. This day marks the events that took place between 1915 and 1923 in which more than 1.5 million Armenians were systematically deported and murdered by a declining Ottoman Empire.

The rich heritage of the Armenian people dates back over 3,000 years and it is only through sheer courage and determination that their culture survives today. Located at what is commonly referred to as "the crossroads of the world", between the Caspian, Black, and Mediterranean Seas. Armenia has fought off foreign aggressors and domination throughout its history.

It was on the night of April 24, 1915, that 200 intellectuals, community leaders, and prominent citizens of Armenian ancestry were executed, signifing the beginning of the plan to exterminate the entire Armenian Christian population located within the Ottoman borders.

The heinous acts committed against the Armenians were clearly the result of a brutally calculated plan which has come to be known as the first genocide of the 20th century.

It is our responsibility to recall this tragic event in the same fashion that we recall later acts of genocide such as that committed against the Jews by a repressive and uncontrolled Nazi regime. It is our responsibility to make this Nation and the world aware of the atrocities of the past, of the injustice and human suffering of entire races of people, so that we can be on the watch. So that we can guarantee as best we can that it shall never happen again.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I want to express to Senators Levin and Riegle my appreciation for providing us with this opportunity to remember and to mourn the systematic, barbaric and unspeakably cruel massacre by Turkey of the 1.5 million martyrs of Armenia, and I wish also to express my outrage at the fact that it took 8 months for the Department of State to formally retract an insulting and demeaning note that appeared at the conclusion of an article in the August 1982 Department of State Bulletin.

"Because the historical record of the 1915 events in Asia Minor is Ambiguous," the note reads, "the Department of State does not endorse allegations that the Turkish Government committed a genocide against the Armenian people."

Mr. President, I cannot imagine how anyone could find the slightest bit of ambiguity about this unspeakably cruel brutal slaughter of a gentle cultured people.

I cannot imagine how anyone who has read the dispatches sent to Washington at the time by then-U.S. Ambassador Henry Morgenthau could describe as "allegations" what Ambassador Morgenthau called "A Campaign of Race Extermination."

I cannot imagine how our State Department could have permitted this contemptible sentence to appear in official print.

And above all, Mr. President, I am truly appalled by the fact that the State Department has only now seen fit to retract this language. I believe that the Department should also apologize—humbly—to the Armenian-American community and to the public at large.

Not long ago, President Reagan expressed his dismay at the fact that there exist today groups and individuals who deny the reality of the Nazi genocide against the Jews.

The President was right to speak as he did. But consider the feelings of the Armenian-American community—of people whose parents and grandparents are in many cases the survivors of the terrible events of 1915 and the years thereafter.

Armenian history is not being distorted by the kinds of hate groups who soil the memory of the Jews of Europe. Instead, Armenian-Americans have confronted a denial of their history by the Government of the United States.

There is nothing ambiguous Mr. President about the headlines in the New York Times at the time the genocide was in progress.

March 20, 1915: Whole Plain Strewn With Armenian Bodies.

April 28, 1915: Appeal to Turkey to Stop Massacres.

June 6, 1915: More Armenian Massacres.

June 29, 1915: Wholesale Massacres of Armenians by Turks.

August 4, 1915: Report Turks Shot Women and Children.

August 6, 1915: Armenian Horrors Show.

August 18, 1915: Armenians Are Sentenced to Perish in Desert.

August 20, 1915, Burn 1,000 Armenians.

August 27, 1915: Turks Depopulate Towns of Armenia.

September 3, 1915: Turks Massacre Armenians of Isnid.

September 5, 1915: 1,500,000 Armenians Starve.

September 16, 1915: Answer Morgenthau by Hanging Armenians.

September 21, 1915: Bryce Asks U.S. To Aid Armenia; says that all the Christians in Trebizond, numbering 10,000 were drowned.

These are just a few of the headlines, the chronicle of horror goes on and on.

September 29, 1915: Armenian Women Put Up at Auction.

October 11, 1915: Spare Armenians, Pope Asks Sultan.

October 13, 1915: Massacres Renewed, Morgenthau Reports.

October 22, 1915: German Says She Cannot Stop Turks.

October 26, 1915: Slay All Armenians in City of Kerasunt.

November 1, 1915: Aid for Armenians Blocked by Turks.

The record could not be more clear.

The Armenians were slaughtered.

They were slaughtered by order of the Turkish authorities.

And they were the first victims in a century that may someday be described by historians as the age of genocide.

The agony of Armenia must not be forgotten.

It must not be trivialized, minimized, or distorted for political purposes.

And, Mr. President, the descendants of the Armenian martyrs must not be made to suffer the grief and pain that have been inflicted upon them by a cynical note in a State Department publication.

As a Senator, I apologize to Armenians everywhere for this outrage, and I call upon the Secretary of State to act immediately to make full amends for a gratuitous and patently false insult to everyone who believes in facing the truth.

THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, earlier this month, over 10,000 Jewish survivors of the Holocaust gathered in Washington to honor those who were murdered by the Nazis and to remember the pain, the suffering and the lessons of that heinous experience. The Holocaust is a sad reminder that those who forget history are condemned to repeat it. The tragedy of the Holocaust might well have been prevented in the world had recalled an earlier, equally dark episode in the 20th century history of mankind: The willful massacre of 1.5 million Armenians at the hands of the Turks during World War I.

Before World War I, Armenians, a gentle, highly cultured people, lived alongside the Turks and demanded only tolerance and freedom from their Turkish rulers. In response, the Turkish Government launched a coordinated drive to round up and eliminate every Armenian man, woman, and child. Today, on the 68th anniversary of the Armenina genocide, we honor those courageous individuals who were exterminated for no other reason than that their national heritage was considered alien by the Turkish leadership.

The Armenian genocide and the Holocaust remind us that man possesses the pernicious quality of bigotry and the capacity to be cruel. We must never forget the despicable, inhuman treatment suffered by the Armenians and the Jews at the hands of their fellow men. We must keep the memories of these solemn and painful events alive in order that history will not repeat itself yet again.

If we are truly concerned about eliminating the evil of genocide from the heart of mankind; if justice and compassion are values which we sincerely cherish; if the death of 1.5 million Armenians is to be more than a tragic footnote to our times; then we must not forget the brutal assault on human dignity which was the Armenian genocide.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, man's inhumanity to man has been an all too prevelent occurrence throughout the centuries. Persecution, banishment, and enslavement of peoples are well-known and well-documented in almost every civilization and every period of history.

But these violations and abuses of basic human rights take on particular importance for us when we consider the most terrible occurrences of our own 20th century. In recent weeks, Americans here in Washington and throughout the United States, again took note of the Holocaust in which 6 million Jews and tens of thousands of other Europeans were simply murdered as a matter of policy of the Nazi government of Germany. As the survivors of that Holocaust and their children gathered in Washington earlier this month, the cry most often heard was, "We must not forget."

We must not and will not forget, Mr. President, for there is to be a Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C., just a short distance from the Mall and the center of our political life. An important part of the museum will be devoted to another tragedy in an earlier part of this century, the massive massacre and systematic persecution of the Armenian people by the Ottoman Empire and the Turkish Government almost 70 years ago.

The killing of over 1.5 million Armenians in Turkey and the scattering of tens of thousands more, particularly in 1915 and the months that followed, was the world's first genocidal experience of this century. How horrible it is to contemplate that a second genocidal policy would follow on even a greater scale only 25 years later. But to the Armenians and those who filed endless numbers of eyewitness accounts of the massacres and mass death following forced deportation of Armenians across Asia Minor in 1915, there could be no set of circumstances imaginable more completely depraved or corrupt or inhumane.

The American Committee on Armenian Atrocities called the genocide, "the greatest, most pathetic, and most arbitrary tragedy in history."

The American Ambassador to Turkey, Henry Morgenthau, Sr., called it a "plan of extermination" in telegrams back to the State Department.

News reports of 1915 quoted eyewitness accounts of the systematic and deliberate nature of the killings of thousands of men, women and children simply because they were Armenian or Christian or both.

On the floor of the House of Lords in London, Lord Crewe brought the attention of the Crown to "wholesale massacre and wholesale deportations" of Armenians carried on under the noise and distraction of another tragedy, the European war we now know as World War I.

As Cicero once noted, "Laws are silent amid the clash of arms." So this was true for the Armenian nation.

The United States was not involved in World War I in 1915, Mr. President, and as the leading neutral nation received numerous appeals to intercede with the Turkish Government on behalf of the Armenians and to provide assistance to the Armenians if possible.

Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan explained our representations and protests as "a matter of humanity." But Ambassador Morgenthau reported no satisfaction from our official protests and appealed for private funds and relief for the Armenians from the injustice, grief, poverty, and starvation; that continued.

The United States and many other countries opened their hearts then, Mr. President, and we must not now close our minds.

We heard excuses then about the needs of the Ottoman Empire, of the requirements of nationalism and of the necessities of development. We have heard these same excuses since then in other contexts—from other states at other times.

But there has never been, nor can there ever be, any acceptable excuse for the systematic murdering of civilian populations.

To know that this has occurred and has been condemned is vital to our determination not to see it happen again or to tolerate any indifference to it.

I salute those of Armenian descent who have worked hard to ensure that the genocide of their people does not fade into historical irrelevance but remains a shocking lesson and horrendous example of the inhumanity of man to man. And I make common cause with them in remembering today the victims of the Armenian genocide and in pledging our every effort to ensure that such a tragedy is never again visited upon any people anywhere on this Earth.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, today I join my colleagues on Armenian Martyrs' Day in commemorating the 70th anniversary of the beginning of the genocide in the Ottoman Empire. It is a day of remembrance for victims of all genocides, but especially for the nearly 1.5 million Armenians who were mercilessly persecuted for 8 long years between 1915 and 1923.

The senseless persecution and slaughter of Armenians during the outbreak of World War I, resulted in the banishment of thousands more Armenians, scattered into a diaspora, forming a worldwide community who, today, urge all people of good faith and conscience never to forget this tragedy. We must never lend credibility to the all too frequently lamented remark that the Armenian genocide is the "forgotten genocide." Because of the war and the isolationist attitude of the United States, at that time, our Government did not, unfortunately, more forcefully protest the actions of the Ottoman Empire. Sadly, the Armenian genocide was not the last but the first of many—too many—acts of genocide which have been perpetrated in this century. Six million Jews under Hitler, untold numbers of Soviet citizens in the Gulag under Stalin, and countless Cambodians under Pol Pot were also victims of the atrocity of genocide. To remember these victims is to make a statement. It is to say, I will not shut my eyes to the pleas of my brethren, for to stand by is to be an accomplice to a crime as serious as the act of genocide itself. To remember these victims is, most importantly, to move toward a better future, a safer future, for our children and the generations to come.

While I look forward to the future, I am concerned. I am concerned that President Reagan's upcoming trip to Germany, which includes a visit to the Bitburg Cemetery where so many Nazi-SS men are buried, overlooks the fact that when the lesson of history's mistakes is not learned well, history becomes reality once again. President Reagan's visit to Bitburg negates a statement which he himself made in a proclamation for the Days of Remembrance for Victims of the Holocaust on April 22, 1981. He said: "Like the genocide of the Armenians before it, and the geneocide of the Cambodians which followed it—and like too many other people—the lessons of the Holocaust must never be forgotten." Let us not forget and let us not lay a wreath on the graves of those who committed the heinous crime of genocide against innocent people.

It is also a great disappointment to me that the Reagan administration cannot support a resolution, indeed in active lobby against a resolution, which recognizes and condemns man's inhumanity to man. To say that this would harm relations with an ally does not recognize the extent of the atrocity that we gather here today to remember.

The purpose of Armenians Martyrs' Day is just that—to never allow the atrocity of genocide to be forgotten. And so, on this day, I honor those innocent dead. I extend my sincerest sympathy to those Armenians who were victims of ruthless murder, and to their descendants and the descendants of all people who have fallen to genocide. And I pledge that we never will forget.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, April 1985 may someday be recorded as the month in which the current administration established an all-time record for callous insensitivity.

April 1985 is the cruel month in which the President of the United States equated the murdered innocents of the Holocaust with the brutal executioners of the Waffen SS.

And it is also the month in which the President opposed a congressional resolution commemorating the terrible massacre in the early years of this century of 1.5 million Armenian men, women, and children at the hands of the Ottoman Turks.

Why is the President opposed to this resolution?

Because, he says, passage of the resolution "might inadvertently encourage or reward terrorist attacks on Turks and Turklish Americans."

And also, says the President, the resolution "could harm relations with an important ally."

That is an outrageous statement.

Yes, there have been terrorist attacks by Armenian extremists against Turkish individuals and installations.

These attacks are insane—they are criminal—and they ill-serve the Armenian cause.

I condemn without equivocation the perpetrators of those atrocities—and so do the leading Armenian-American civic and religious organizations.

But to say that because of these terrorists, we should ignore the historical reality of the Armenian genocide—that is totally unacceptable.

We have in Northern Ireland today groups that are addicted to the politics of the gun and the bomb.

Does that mean that we should ignore or deny the tragic history of Ireland?

Of course it does not.

And it is a disservice to the American people and, in fact, to our Turkish friends to go along for political reasons with the sadly misguided efforts of the Turkish Government to deny a monumental atrocity—but one for which the Turks of today cannot be held accountable.

The President describes Turkey as "an important ally."

But, Mr. President, the Federal Republic of Germany is also an important ally.

And just as we cannot for political reasons deny that today's democratic Federal Republic was built on the ashes of the Third Reich, we cannot diminish, deny or demean the agony, suffering, and death inflicted by Ottoman Turkey upon the Armenian people.

I am very much ashamed, Mr. President, that the leaders of our Government have once again paid more attention to politics and to lobbyists than to the cause of justice and truth. And I hope that the Senate will demonstrate by passing this commemorative resolution that we, at least, respect the memory of the martyrs of Armenia.

COMMEMORATING THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, today we pay tribute to all the victims of genocide, particularly the 1.5 million Armenians who suffered at the hands of the Turkish authorities. As part of that tribute, today has been designated as a "National Day of Man's Inhumanity to Man." The leadership of my colleague from Michigan, Senator LEVIN and his staff member, Steve Serkaian, in focusing the Senate's attention on this important issue year after year is commendable. For only through commemoration of these victims can we educate the American people about the Armenian experience and prevent history from repeating itself.

This year is particularly significant because it marks the 70th anniversary of the beginning of the genocide perpetrated in the Turkish Ottoman empire between 1915 and 1923. As many of the survivors of the genocide travel to Washington on this day, we join with them in honoring the memory of those who perished.

The genocide began on April 24, 1915, when hundreds of Armenian religious, political and intellectual leaders were rounded up, exiled and eventually murdered in remote places in Anatolia. Within several months, the approximately 250,000 Armenians serving in the Ottoman Army during World War I were disarmed and placed in forced labor battalions where they were either starved or executed. The Armenian people, deprived of their leadership and young able-bodied men, were disarmed under threat of severe punishment, and then deported from every city, town, and village of Asia minor and Turkish minor. The majority of the deportees died on the marches from starvation, disease, and massacre. Approximately 500,000 refugees escaped to the north across the Russian border, south into Arab countries, or to Europe and the United States.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, this week marks the 71st anniversary of the genocide perpetrated against the Armenian people by the Ottoman Empire during World War I. Today, I am pleased to join Armenians throughout the world in paying tribute to the victims and survivors of this evil crime.

Before World War I, Armenians, a gentle and highly cultured people, demanded only tolerance and freedom from the rulers of the Ottoman Empire. In response, Ottoman rulers launched a coordinated drive to round up and eliminate every Armenian man, woman, and child. In 1915, the empire began deporting Armenians and from that time until the empire collapsed, an estimated 1.5 million Armenians—some 60 percent of the Armenian population—were killed or died of disease or exposure. Today, we honor those courageous individuals who were exterminated for no other reason than that their national heritage was considered alien by those who ruled the Ottoman Empire.

The modern state of Turkey bears no responsibility for the tragic acts committed by the Ottoman Empire against the Armenian people. It should, however, acknowledge that these events took place. Kemal Atataurk did so many years ago when he condemned the massacres of millions by his Ottoman predecessors. The present government should do no less.

The Armenian genocide reminds us that man possesses the pernicious quality of bigotry and the capacity to be cruel. We must never forget the despicable, inhuman treatment suffered by the Armenians at the hands of their fellow men. To do so, as the tragedy of the Holocaust shows, is to invite a repetition of what may be man's most reprehensible crime, genocide.

The way to commemorate the suffering of the Armenian people is to keep the memory of the Armenian genocide alive and to reaffirm our commitment to human life and dignity. The Senate recently took an important and in my view much delayed step toward reaffirming this commitment by approving Genocide Convention. Now we must eliminate the evil of genocide from the heart of mankind so that the victims of the Armenian genocide did not die in vain.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I rise today to recall the systematic execution of more than 1½ million Armenians at the hands of the Ottoman Turks. This first act of genocide in the twentieth century has too often been relegated to the footnotes of history and conveniently forgotten. It is our duty to recognize this horrific act of man's inhumanity to man and once again pledge our Nation's commitment to prevent future crimes of genocide.

On February 19 of this year, the Senate finally voted to ratify the Genocide Convention. In the humane spirit of this action, I believe it is fitting to remember the suffering of the Armenian people.

Between 1915 and 1923, the Ottoman Government sanctioned the murder of over 1.5 million Armenian Christians and drove hundreds of thousands more permanently away from their ancestral homeland under the guise of Pan-Turkism. Entire villages of Armenians were forcibly deported, thousands more peasants were kidnaped and exiled. Many or most of the deportees died of starvation, disease, or exposure. Large portions of the Armenian intelligensia and professional classes were abducted and simply slaughtered.

After the First World War, the Armenians sent a delegation seeking justice to the peace conference at Versailles. However, the great powers gathered there failed to act against those responsible for the Armenian genocide. One hundred and fifty Turks who were among those allegedly involved in the genocide were released unpunished from British jails. No war crimes trials followed World War I. There were no opportunities for the victims of the Armenian genocide to gain some semblance of legal retribution. There was no Nuremburg.

Fortunately, one man, Prof. Raphael Lemkin, championed the cause of the Armenian people. At the International Conference on the Unification of Criminal Law, held in Madrid in 1933, Lemkin proposed "to declare the destruction of racial, religious, or social collectivities" a crime under international law. Raphael Lemkin coined the word "genocide" in 1944 to describe the Nazi Holocaust of World War II. He ceaselessly fought to instill in the human conscience an abhorrence of genocide calling for international participation in the Genocide Convention.

Turkey today, unlike Germany, refuses to admit responsibility for its act of genocide. The Turkish denial needlessly perpetuates bitter animosity on the part of Armenians in the United States and elsewhere. It is time for the Government of Turkey to officially acknowledge its responsibility for its crimes of 1915 to 1923 and publicly apologize to the Armenian people.

We cannot purge history of its ugly chapters. Lessons of terror are just as important as lessons of compassion and valor. An enlightened knowledge of our barbaric past is the only weapon we may bear to prevent future acts of genocide. Should another mad man ask the question, as Hitler did—"who remembers the Armenians?"—we must all be able to answer—"I do."

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, 2 months ago the Senate of the United States gave its advice and consent to the International Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, a document signed by the United States in 1948 and submitted to the Senate the following year. Ratification of the convention after nearly 37 years is a symbol of our commitment to the future; it is also a remembrance of the past, our commemoration of genocide's tragic victims.

Our century, so notable for progress in other ways, has been profoundly scarred by genocide, a crime of such magnitude that it is difficult to grasp its dimensions or determine precisely the number of its victims. Indeed, the word genocide is itself a mid-twentieth-century word, coined in an effort to come to terms with the tragedy of deliberate mass extermination.

We do not live in the past, but we cannot live without it. To ignore or forget the past is to remain its captive; remembrance and understanding are the means of coming to grips with its legacy.

That is why we take time today to mark the appalling, systematic assault committed 71 years ago against the Armenian people. The Armenian massacres, as they were called, uprooted an entire nation, deliberately eliminated its leaders and intellectuals and left the survivors homeless, scattering them around the world. One and one-half million persons are estimated to have perished in a train of events of which the then-U.S. Ambassador, Henry Morgenthau, wrote:

"I am confident that the whole history of the human race contains no such horrible episode as this. The great massacres and persecutions of the past seem almost insignificant when compared to the sufferings of the Armenian race in 1915."

This day has special meaning for Armenians everywhere. Having lived with tragedy—few families were unaffected by it—they are committed to the proposition that their experience has meaning for all of us. And indeed, in the face of such tragedy remembrance and understanding are universal imperatives, essential to decent people and decept societies; they cannot be the special province only of the survivors.

Americans of Armenian descent, who have distinguished themselves in every aspect of our national life, have at the same time kept alive the rich traditions of their unique heritage. Consider the story of Dr. Vartan Gregorian, President of the New York Public Library, who came to this country in 1956 in search of an education because, in the words of a recent profile by Philip Hamburger.

"Some instinct told him that America was the place for him."

In my own State of Maryland, Armenian Americans play a vital role in our pluralistic and democratic society, and their contributions to our cultural, social, political and economic life are varied and unique.

We join our Armenian American friends, neighbors and colleagues in marking this day. The Armenian tragedy has meaning for all of us. As citizens of a free nation, founded on the ideals of human dignity and freedom, we commemorate the Armenian genocide to pay tribute to the memory of its victims, and above all to reaffirm our own determination to see that so terrible a crime shall never be repeated.

We still do not have justice. We still have a situation in which an accounting has not been made, and we must maintain the pressure until it is made. I intend to be part of the effort to continue that struggle until, finally, justice is done.

THE ARMENIAN TRAGEDY

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I want to join my colleagues today in honoring the concern of the Armenian people who suffered the tragedy of mass destruction between 1915–1923.

The terrible events of those years testified to the fact that modern societies and governments can be a mask for ancient brutalities. This truth helps explain the strong interest of the American people in human rights on a worldwide basis. It underpinned the spirited campaign of Eleanor Roosevelt and the American Government for the adoption by the U.N. General Assembly of the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It was influential in the decision by the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council, of which I am a member, to give the Armenian catastrophe a place of prominence in the projected Holocaust Museum to be built here in Washington on the Mall.

The story of the Armenian tragedy should not be buried and forgotten. It should be told. It should be told, like others that have followed it, not to stir up division, but to encourage reconciliation; not just to recall the suffering of the past, but to strengthen the commitment to standards for today and tomorrow which exclude racism and genocide.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I rise today to join a number of my Senate colleagues in paying tribute and recognition to the 68th anniversary of Armenian Martyrs Day. At about this time every year we take time to honor the memory of the 1.5 million Armenians who perished during the years 1915–1923 at the hands of the Ottoman Turkish Empire.

Near the close of the 19th century, the Armenian population of the Ottoman Empire became the target of increased persecution by the government. This persecution reached truly gruesome proportions during the 1915–1923 period and serves as yet another tragic reminder of how cruel human beings can sometimes be to one another.

Mr. President, I am very pleased that the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council, of which I am a member, has unanimously resolved to include the Armenian genocide in its museum and educational programs. The reason why was stated eloquently by council chairman Elie Wiesel in 1981:

"Before the planning of the final solution, Hitler asked, 'Who remembers the Armenians?' He was right. No one remembered them, as no one remembers the Jews. Rejected by everyone, they felt expelled from history."

We were wise in establishing the Holocaust Memorial Council to commemorate the suffering of the Jewish people under the Nazi regime, and we are also wise to remember the persecution of the Armenians. After all, the same evil instinct in the human spirit which was responsible for the Jewish Holocaust was also at work in the case of the Armenians and more recently in Cambodia.

Mr. President, if we continually remind ourselves of these events perhaps we can prevent future holocausts. In this sense, Armenian Martyrs Day is both a commemoration and a warning. I therefore offer my thanks to my colleagues, Senator RIEGLE and Senator LEVIN, for organizing this special order in the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague from Michigan in sponsoring a resolution which recognizes the terrible fate of over 1.5 million Armenians. Though this tragedy occurred over 65 years ago, it is important to recognize that history cannot be rewritten or forgotten. To this end, I join Senator LEVIN in offering this resolution.

Mr. President, I would also ask unanimous consent that a statement on this issue by the Honorable Governor of California, George Deukmejian, be printed in the RECORD. Governor Deukmejian is the Nation's first Governor of Armenian descent. His remarks, which appeared in the Sunday, April 24, edition of the Los Angeles Times, reflect the concern which members of the Armenian community share about the recognition of this horrible demonstration of inhumanity.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"OUR DEBT TO THE PAST WILL SECURE OUR FUTURE

"(By George Deukmejian)

"The observance of Armenian Martyrs Day has always been a deeply moving experience for me. This year it has new meaning. I know that I would not be here at today's observance as governor of the nation's most populous state if it were not for this great country—the land of hope, freedom and opportunity for so many, regardless of their background. President Theodore Roosevelt expressed it very well when he said: 'America is not a matter of birthplace or creed or line of descent. America is a matter of principle, of idealism, of character.'

"We can be thankful that, for us, America is the free and beautiful homeland that our parents, grandparents, brothers and sisters only dreamed of. It was a dream for which many of our loved ones died. They suffered so that we could have the opportunity to provide a future of hope and prosperity for ourselves and our children.

"And so I urge all Americans of Armenian descent: As we share the painful memories that bring us together today, let us remember how fortunate we are to live in this land and to have a place we can call home.

"Much of the world's population is not so fortunate, including millions of Armenians who still live under oppression and discrimination. It is for them, as much as for the victims of unspeakable atrocities, that we gather and pray today.

"As Armenian-Americans, we share many strong bonds of pride. But we also share bonds of pain. Few of our families escaped murder, violence and terror that marked one of history's darkest chapters. We hurt together, we cry together and yes, we are angry that, year after year, decade after decade, the wrongs inflicted upon our people have gone unanswered and largely ignored.

"But tears and anger alone accomplish nothing. Instead, it is our duty to share the lessons of our painful past with a world that seems to have learned little about common human decency.

"Let's remember that we are hardly alone in our suffering. Violence in many forms has become a part of the daily diet of most of mankind. How many Americans have been victimized by criminals? How many millions of people around the world live under the constant threat of death or imprisonment simply because they seek freedom, self-determination and a homeland they can call their own?

"To be free from violence and the fear of violence is a basic human right, and I consider it the first responsibility of government. That is why restoring public safety here in California has been the central concern of my public life and is my top priority as governor.

"Yet throughout this century, beginning with the planned murder of 1.5 million Armenians, it has been government that has committed the worst crimes of violence and the worst violations of basic human rights.

"That is why we must never lower our voices—as individuals or as a nation—in support of people around the world who are struggling to break the yoke of totalitarianism and violence. We must never lower our guard against potential enemies, both foreign and domestic, who would infringe on our own precious gifts of freedom and democracy.

"We are often asked why we are so insistent on calling attention to atrocities that occurred many years ago. Why do we bring upon ourselves the pain of recalling the loss of families and friends and homes?

"The answer is very simple. If the decent, humane people of this world don't remember, you can be sure that the tyrants will—and history will go on repeating itself, just as it has in recent years in Cambodia, Iran, Poland and Afghanistan.

"Who can ignore the chilling words of Adolf Hitler, who felt he could get away with the elimination of Polish Jews during World War II because, as he put it, 'Who still talks nowadays of the extermination of Armenians?'

"It is with both profound sorrow and a sense of pride that I, as governor of California, have issued a proclamation designating today as a state Day of Remembrance. Let us mark this observance not only by memorializing the loved ones we have lost, but also by rededicating ourselves to the ideal for which they persevered: the right of all people to live and work and raise their children in peace and freedom."

(Mr. REID assumed the Chair.)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I would also at this time like to give you some headlines from stories that appeared in the New York Times, a fairly credible newspaper. I do not always agree with it philosophically, but these were news reports, news reports from around the world, news reports from Turkey at the time of the genocide. And let me refer to some of those.

These are not anything this Senator compiled. They are public records.

The New York Times, September 17, 1915: "Mission Board Told of Turkish Horrors."

September 17: "The Death of Armenia."

September 18: "Several American Missionaries Dead."

September 21: "Bryce Asks United States To Aid Armenia."

September 24: "500,000 Armenians Said To Have Perished."

November 25: "Extermination Menaces Armenia."

September 29: "Armenian Women Put Up at Auction." "800,000 Armenians Counted Destroyed." "Already Has 75 Fundraisers for Armenians." "Spare Armenians, Pope Asks Sultan." "Turkish Official Denies Attrocities." "Thousands Protest Armenian Murders." "Only 200,000 Armenians Now Left in Turkey." "Aid for Armenians Blocked by Turkey." "American's Death Laid to Turks."

"Turks Wipe Out Entire Population in Town on the Black Sea." "Armenians Heroic Stand in Mountains." "A Million Armenians Killed or in Exile. Some Armenians Drowned in Groups."

This is how they killed them.

"Armenian Tells of Death Pilgrimage." "Armenian Girls Tell of Massacres." "Still Murder Armenians." "Saw Turkish Atrocities."

They are all news stories in the New York Times.

I have not seen anybody refute any of these.

"Whole Plain Strewn with Armenian Bodies." "Allies to Punish Turks Who Murder." "Wholesale Massacre of Armenians by Turks." "Turks Depopulate Towns of Armenia." "Reports Turks Shot Women and Children." "Armenians Are Sent To Perish in the Desert."

You get out your map; you can see where they were taken.

"Burned 1,000 Armenians." "One and a Half Million Armenians Starved."

Again, take it or leave it.

You know, there was a triumvirate in Turkey of Talaat, Djemal and Enver, and this was a ciphered telegram sent by Enver, who was High Command Minister of War, from the War Office, sent to all the commanding officers of the army, February 27, 1918.

In view of present circumstances, the Imperial Government has issued an order for the extermination of the whole Armenian race. The following operation ought to be made with regard to them. All the Armenians in the country or Ottoman subjects from 5 years of age upwards will be taken out of the towns and slaughtered.

All the Armenians serving in the Imperial armies are to be separated from the divisions without making any disturbance, taken into the solitary places away from the public eye, and shot.

Armenian officers in the army are to be imprisoned in the barracks belonging to their regiment until further orders. Forty-eight hours after these three orders are communicated to the commanders of each regiment, a special order will be issued for their execution.

You are not to take any other operation except those indispensable for the execution of these orders.

Representatives of the High Command, Minister of War, Mr. Enver, who was leader of the Young Turk movement which came to power in 1909. As Minister of War and codictator of Turkey with Talot and Jermal, he was the principal author of the plan to exterminate Armenians.

We have had reference to statements by our Ambassador in Turkey, an honorable man, Mr. Morgenthau. In 1915, July 16, he sent the following telegram.

Deportation of and excesses against peaceful Armenians is increasing and from harrowing reports of eye witnesses it appears that a campaign of race extermination is in progress under a pretext of reprisal against rebellion.

Protests as well as threats are unveiling and probably incite the Ottoman Government, not the Republic of Turkey, to do more tragic measures. They are determined to display responsibility for absolute disregard for capitulations. And I believe nothing short of actual force, which obviously the United States is not in position to exert, would adequately meet the situation.

Suggest you inform the belligerent nations and missions boards of this.

Signed by the U.S. Mission Ambassador Morgenthau. He was Ambassador from 1914 to 1916.

We have already seen what Hitler had to say. I think it was quoted yesterday by the distinguished Senator from Illinois. He talked about his strength. He said it did not matter to him what anybody else said about him in the West. He said:

I issued the command and anyone who utters one word of criticism is going to be executed by the firing squad.

He said in conclusion:

Who after all speaks today of the annihilation of Armenians? I have not seen that refuted. I have not seen any evidence.

This is Adolf Hitler speaking, not really a guy you want living next door.

What did the Ottoman Minister of the Interior have to say? He was sort of in charge. He was sort of head of this triumvirate. January 15, the Government of Allepo—that happens to be Syria. That is where they were driving all these people. January 15, 1916:

We hear that certain orphanages which have been opened receive also the children of Armenians. Whether this is done through ignorance of real purpose or through contempt of it, the government will regard the feeding of such children or any attempt to prolong their lives as acts entirely opposed to its purpose, since it considers the survival of these children as detrimental.

Starve the children. Starve the children.

I recommend that such children shall not be received into the orphanages and no attempts are to be made to establish special orphanages for them.

Minister of the Interior Talant

Another order, earlier, September 16, 1915.

It was first communicated to you that the government, by order of Djemal, I think it had committed, had decided to destroy completely all Armenians living in Turkey. Those who oppose this order and decision cannot remain on the official staff of the Empire. An end must be put to their existence, however criminal these measures taken may be, and no regard must be paid to either age or sex or to conscientious scruples.

Again, that was an instruction of the Government of Allepo from the Minister of the Interior, who in effect was in charge of this destruction of the Armenian race, the Armenian people.

Now again it seems to me that somebody from the Turkish Embassy or someone who may be representing Turkey could tell us that all these stories are false, all these stories that appeared in the New York Times—and there are similar articles in the Los Angeles papers and Washington papers. These are from only one paper at the time, the New York Times. Let me make certain nobody misunderstands. I am not saying everything that is printed is accurate. I read a lot of inaccurate stories. Some even have my name in them. So I know there are a lot of inaccurate stories.

But is anybody going to stand up and refute the content of these stories: "Wholesale Massacres"; "Turks Depopulate Towns in Armenia"; "Turks Starve Children"; "Women Are Sold at Auction"? When are we going to get down to the business of refuting what appears to be overwhelming evidence that there was a deliberate attempt to wipe out a race, the Armenian Christians?

Let me confess that I never paid much attention to this tragedy until I met an Armenian doctor in Chicago after World War II.

He did not dwell on the genocide. He dwelled on healing me. But he did indicate he was born in Turkey and members of his family were victims of the genocide. I never paid much attention to it at the time. I was trying to get out of the Army and get well, and he was operating on me a number of times, but I sort of kept that in the back of my mind.

I must confess, even after I came to Congress, I never focused much on what was called the Armenian genocide. But I guess the longer I was around, the more I saw other Senators stand up and speak about it, I must confess I guess my personal relationship with Dr. Kelikian may have had an impact, but it was not anything that sort of drove me to this position. But I heard other Senators, Republicans and Democrats, stand up on this floor condemning this atrocity. So one day I made a speech and I pointed out what little I knew about it then.

It just seems to me that here we have a commemorative resolution where the principals and the people in the Ottoman Empire are right or wrong. Now, if somebody can refute all of this evidence, go ahead. But I think we pretty much proved our case beyond a reasonable doubt.

I have some other material that I want to put in the RECORD briefly because I think this is an important debate, an important resolution. It is important for Senators and members of their staffs, who may not be able to come to the floor now, to know precisely what evidence we are producing. If we cannot make our case, no one should vote for the resolution. Let them open up the archives. As I said yesterday, you open up most archives in 50 years. These have not been opened yet, and it is going to be 75 years come April 24. How long do you wait? People say let history be the judge. Well, we have waited, and history has been the judge. We put in the RECORD yesterday the resolution passed by the European Parliament. They made a finding that it was genocide. We do not do that in the language that I will offer as a substitute.

Let me refer again to what the late Senator Scoop Jackson had to say on February 27, 1983.

I want to join my colleagues today in honoring the concern of the Armenian people who suffered the tragedy of mass destruction between 1915-1923.

He said in his conclusion:

The story of the Armenian tragedy should not be buried and forgotten. It should be told. It should be told, like others that have followed it, not to stir up division, but to encourage reconciliation; not just to recall the suffering of the past, but to strengthen the commitment to standards for today and tomorrow which, exclude racism and genocide.

And I think Senator Jackson, in fact I know Senator Jackson spoke for a number of Senators in that statement.

I have included in the RECORD or have asked permission to include in the RECORD statements by Senators who have spoken on the issue in April 1983, April 1985, April 1986, and April 1987. I think, as I made a rough count, it was 26 or 27 different Senators who made statements on the Armenian genocide, eloquent statements by Senator SPECTER and Senator LAUTENBERG, Senator GLENN, Senator METZENBAUM, Senator BRADLEY, and many, many others.

Mr. DOLE. I have already made reference to the Hitler quote. Some say, well, it never happened. Well, it can be found in the British archives, documents on British foreign policy, third series, volume vii, 1939, page 257 and the New York Times, November 24, 1945, edition.

We had yesterday, and I will include additional material in the RECORD, statements by Ataturk and his acknowledgment of the genocide. The other side said, "Oh, it is nothing but a Swiss journalist's fabrication." But there is another news source, the memoirs of a future Turkish Prime Minister, Rauf Orbay.

I ask unanimous consent that the quote be printed in the RECORD at the appropriate point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MUSTAFA KEMAL'S (ATATURK'S) ACKNOWLEDGMENTS OF THE GENOCIDE

Issue: The founder of the modern Republic of Turkey acknowledged the prior government's massacres several times. Resolution opponents may claim that the best known quote is a fabrication of a Swiss journalist, Hildebrand, but another (new) source is the memoirs of a future Turkish Prime Minister, Rauf Orbay.

POINTS AND AUTHORITIES

1. In a June 1926 interview with Swiss journalist Emile Hildebrand, Ataturk said that the responsible Young Turk government "should have been made to account for the lives of millions of our Christian subjects who were ruthlessly driven en masse from their homes and massacred." Los Angeles Examiner 8/1/26. Opponents now claim the quote is a fabrication because Turkish records and Ataturk's diary do not record the interview, but the Turkish government and Ataturk did not dispute the quote when published. On the other hand, when a small U.S. paper published an account alleging that Ataturk was a sexual deviate, the Turkish government vigorously pursued the State Department to punish the writer and newspaper.

a. The memoirs of Rauf Orbay, future Turkish Prime Minister and Ataturk's close colleague, report that in 1919 Ataturk acknowledged to U.S. General Harbard "the massacre by the Turks of 800,000 Armenians". In March 1919 the Ministry of Interior had compiled the figure of 800,000 deaths.

b. In May 1988, a Turkish newspaper reported the following Ataturk quote from his April 24, 1920 address to the Grand National Assembly: "the massacres of the Armenians are a scandal that belongs to the past." 2000 e dogru No. 23 May 9—June 4, 1988, edition; other sources are Sacak January 1987; and "Ataturk's Speeches and Statements" vol. I (Institute for the Study of the History of the Turkish Revolution).

c. Finally, in a November 1918 interview with Maurice Prax, published in Petit Parisien Ataturk complained that the Allies were delaying in hanging the leaders of the Young Turk party (the Committee of Union and Progress;) including, Enver, Talaat, and Jemal Pasha. These men were the architects of the Genocide.

Mr. DOLE. I have touched on the scholars.

I did not mention Leslie Davis, but I will mention Leslie Davis now. Leslie Davis was United States counsel to the Interior of Turkey when the United States was neutral in World War I, between 1915 and 1917. He said he witnessed the extermination of over 100,000 Armenians in his province. His firsthand account is yet another irrefutable source on the genocide and has been published with the title he coined, "The Slaughterhouse Province."

The Slaughterhouse Province is remarkable for several reasons. The body of the book consists of a previously confidential report by the U.S. Consul, Leslie Davis, to the interior of Turkey during the Genocide. Davis actually witnessed the Armenians being taken from their homes to be killed. He also rode horseback to the sites where people were slaughtered to see the bodies. His testimony explicitly refutes claims that the government did not order the massacres as well as claims that only Armenians fomenting rebellion were killed. Government officials asked him to sign a statement on Armenian insurrection, but when Davis asked for substantiation, the officials had only twelve cases (out of over 100,000 deaths in his province) of Armenians resisting the massacres and "only four or five instances where any Turks had been killed or even injured by Armenians." (72-75).

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a brief statement from the book review on mass killing of Armenians which appeared in the New York Times.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Nov. 15, 1989]

KILLING OF ARMENIANS

A small publisher in New Rochelle, N.Y. is shipping copies of a book that could play a role in the debate over American foreign and domestic policy. The book is entitled "The Slaughterhouse Province: An American Diplomat's Report on the Armenian Genocide, 1915-1917" (Aristide D. Caratzas Publisher). It is said to be the first published eyewitness report by a diplomat about the killing of hundreds of thousands of Armenians who lived in the Ottoman Turkish Empire.

Last month, the Senate Judiciary Committee approved a resolution designating April 24, 1990, as a day of remembrance "of the Armenian Genocide of 1915-1923" at the hands of the Ottoman Turks. The resolution, now before the full Senate, is opposed by the Bush Administration and others on the ground that it could jeopardize relations with Turkey.

The eyewitness report—by Leslie A. Davis, the United States consul in eastern Asia Minor—was uncovered in the National Archives by Susan K. Blair, a historian and editor. Ms. Blair has written a 35-page introduction to the book, and in her acknowledgements she says that she was guided and encouraged by Barbara Tuchman, the Pulitzer Prize-winning historian, whose grandfather, Henry Morgenthau, Sr., was the United States Ambassador to the Ottoman Empire at this time.

Mr. Davis submitted his report to the State Department for internal use, and it was classified as confidential. The full text of that report is in the book, as well as copies of Mr. Davis's consular dispatches to the United States Embassy in Constantinople, his photographs of victims and his letters to Mr. Morgenthau. In one of those letters, Mr. Davis—who retired from the foreign service in 1941, at age 65, after having also served in Russia, Portugal and Scotland—says the punishment inflicted upon the Armenians "is so severe, the tragedy is so terrible, that one cannot contemplate it and certainly cannot live in the midst of it without beign stirred to the depths of one's nature."

Daryal Batibay, deputy chief of mission at the Turkish Embassy, said he had not seen the book. But he added that during World War I, "there was an armed insurrection by Armenian groups within the Ottoman Empire against their state, supported by Czarist Russia," the country with which the Ottoman Empire was at war. "There was large-scale suffering on both sides, Turks and Armenians alike," he said, "but there was no genocide."

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I understand the distinguished Senator from Arizona wishes to speak. Maybe the Senator from Illinois, also. I am speaking under the consent agreement of the distinguished President pro tempore. Would there be any objection to my yielding to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have promised the Senator from Nebraska that I would yield to him after the distinguished Republican leader completes his statement, and I have seen another Senator on the floor that I intend to yield to. I will be happy to yield to Mr. DECONCINI at some point whenever the distinguished Republican leader finishes his statement. Certainly, I am not pressing him to hurry to complete it by any means. But I have promised Mr. EXON some time.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, if the Senator from West Virginia will yield, I do not want to keep others here. They have other things to do. I will yield at this point and maybe at a later time, after everybody else has spoken and there are no other speakers, then maybe I can regain the floor and not have my remarks interrupted. I will try to join them together later on, if that is satisfactory.

Mr. BYRD. Yes, Absolutely. Mr. President, may I say to the Republican leader, he may speak as long as he wishes, right now. But, certainly he has the right to get the floor later and continue his speech and have it all put together in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and not show any interruptions.

Mr. DOLE. I do want to defer to my colleagues who have been waiting, but I would not want to be called for making a second speech, if I do that.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there will be no intention on my part to attempt to charge the distinguished Republican leader with a second speech.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. BYRD. I have guarded against that myself earlier today, asking consent that my own speech of the day not constitute a second speech, because I spoke on the calendar of the day on yesterday.

But when the distinguished Republican leader completes his speech I do want to return to my statement and I will yield at this time to Mr. EXON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has yielded the floor. The Senator from West Virginia under the previous order is now recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Very well, Mr. President. Before I yield to Mr. EXON and while the distinguished Republican leader is on the floor, I have listened with great interest to his comments. And what I say in regard to the New York Times' stories, as the distinguished Republican leader pointed out, is not meant to denigrate either the stories or what the distinguished Republican leader is saying.

But, I shall say, and I will say it in what I hope is the right spirit: The distinguished Republican leader, in demonstrating what happened in those years as—Mr. President, may there be order in the Senate? There is plenty of room on the couches for our aides to sit, so they will not be conversing while some of us are trying to make a coherent statement. The distinguished Republican leader points out these stories. We do not argue with those. I do not argue with those.

So, I have to say that his stories miss the point. I, and others, have accepted as a fact that there were thousands and thousands and thousands of Armenians who were murdered, many, many years ago, some of which years were before I was born.

I was born during the First World War in the administration of President Wilson, 1917. So, some of these atrocities occurred before I was born. And they occurred before a great many others who are Members of this body were born.

So, we accept that. I have not argued, and I do not think anyone who has spoken on my side of the question has argued, that there were not atrocities. We have accepted that. We have conceded that.

But that is not the point. The point is that the determination is of the commission of a crime called genocide, which is a serious crime, and the Senate is not in a position to make that determination.

That determination is not to be made in this body. We have not conducted hearings. We have not conducted investigations. We do not have the records before us. We are politicians. We are not historians. And we should not put ourselves in the position of making the Senate an instrument of determination of what is genocide and what is not genocide and what race or what nation now or in the far distant past committed the inexplicably horrific crime of genocide. That is the point and I hope that Senators will keep their eyes on that ball.

So, with all due respect to my friend—and he makes a very impressive case here, it touches all of us—but, having said that: It is beside the point. The point, as I say, being that we approved the ratification of the Genocide Convention. And we passed implementing legislation. We created the instrument and the road map whereby guidance should be given in the determination of what constitutes genocide and what nation or race is guilty of it.

The Senate is in no position to do that. We are politicians. We are not historians. Some of us try to be scholars of history. I think we all try to be scholars of history. There are no historians in this body that I know of. And, if there are, they have not studied the records which need to be opened and studied and evaluated before any such criminal determination can be made.

Mr. President, I restate: The Senate cannot and should not conduct a genocide trial against the country of Turkey. That is what we are trying to do here today. We do not have the equipment. We are not equipped ourselves to do it. We are not qualified to do it, and it is a political decision that should not be made. That is what it would be, it would be a political decision.

Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, Mr. EXON, for such time as he may consume.

I ask I be permitted to resume the floor once he has yielded it and that my resumption of the floor not constitute a second speech and that my speech in the RECORD not show an interruption by virtue of my yielding to him.

Mr. DECONCINI. Will the leader yield before the request is granted? I am sorry to impose on the leader but I wonder if it is possible, assuming the Senator from Nebraska is finished before the hour of 5 o'clock, if I might have 5 minutes on this matter?

Mr. BYRD. Absolutely. I ask unanimous consent that following the statement of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON] I may yield, then under the same terms and circumstances, to the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

Mr. DECONCINI. I thank the President pro tempore.

I think, really, the Senator from Illinois was here even before I was. I would be glad to wait, if the President pro tempore would give him 5 minutes ahead of me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I will be happy to yield under the same terms and circumstances to the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. I think, in fairness to my colleague from Arizona who does want to get out of here by 5 for sure, I would yield to him and then, if I could have 7 or 8 minutes after that I would appreciate it.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I will do the yielding, with all due respects, because I have the floor. I will be happy to yield to either one of the two, Senator DECONCINI or the Senator from Illinois, following the Senator from Nebraska.

May I say I do not intend to hold the floor all day long but I have a speech here that is 59 pages in length and I have only delivered 10 pages of it.

Mr. LEVIN. While the President pro tempore is interrupting that speech for others, I wonder if he might add me to that?

Mr. BYRD. Yes. Mr. President, under the same terms and circumstances, I add the Senator from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN].

Mr. DECONCINI. I will thank the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Seantor from West Virginia has propounded a unanimous-consent request. Is there objection? Hearing none, that will be the order.

The Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. EXON. I thank the Chair, and I thank my friend and colleague from West Virginia, the former distinguished majority leader, now President pro tempore of the U.S. Senate.

Mr. President, I rise to oppose Senate Joint Resolution 212, and I will be as brief as I can to make the remarks that I would like to make.

I listened with great interest to the very interesting presentation made by the Senate minority leader. I listened very intently because he was giving us some information that happened 70 or 80 years ago, sometime in that timeframe. As I listened to him, I felt in that tragedy that things like this happen, but I must agree with my colleague from West Virginia that as bad as that is, and it was a terrible tragedy, it is beside the point with what we are attempting to do if Senate Joint Resolution 212 becomes law.

I suspect this terrible tale of tragedy has been repeated throughout history on many occasions. While I feel badly about that, I hope that no one will accuse the Senator from Nebraska of being a supporter of genocide if I vote against this resolution.

I am reading from a note that was on my desk explaining some of the major issues pro and con on this particular resolution. Under the pro issues is listed this phrase: "Passing the resolution would not endanger U.S. national security interests nor should it endanger U.S. relations with Turkey. The resolution concerns the Ottoman Empire, not the Republic of Turkey."

I hope none of the Members will see fit to vote for this resolution if they believe that statement, because I think that statement is grossly erroneous and is the heart and soul of the reason that I will oppose Senate Joint Resolution 212.

Mr. President, I do not know whether genocide occurred 70 or 80 years ago or not. That is one of the issues that has been talked about a great deal here, but it is an issue I believe the U.S. Senate, with the current information that we have, is not in a position to make a determination as to whether or not this was genocide. But even all that aside, Mr. President, somewhere along the line the U.S. Senate must recognize what its current responsibilities are. I repeat, Mr. President, what its current responsibilities are.

The phrase that I just read from the proposition on this resolution I think is totally false. If this resolution passes, from what I have been able to ascertain, and I talked to many people about this in whom I have a great deal of confidence, including my colleague and friend from West Virginia, if this resolution passes, it is going to be to the detriment of the national security interests of the United States now. I do not know whether it would have been detrimental to the national security interests of the United States 80 years ago or not, but let us talk about now, and let us talk about the future.

There is not any question that the Republic of Turkey is strongly opposed, without equivocation, to any type of a resolution such as this, even if it were further "watered down."

I do not know all of the reasons that the Republic of Turkey is opposed to this, but I think it is safe to say that they would consider this an affront to a very important military ally of the United States, the Republic of Turkey.

The Republic of Turkey, I hope all know and understand, is a member of NATO. I suspect that with the recent development in Europe, with the decline and the tearing down of the Berlin Wall, with what appears to be a significant victory that we have obtained over at least the satellite nations of the Soviet Union, I think most people would agree while we hope it is not true, that very likely the next hot spot, as far as international tensions are concerned, will be in Southwest Asia. And there is Turkey, in a particularly strategic position, a key military ally of the United States, a member of NATO. Is it in the security interests of the United States to chance the displeasure of an important military ally as we look down the road to what we might be confronting in the future?

Mr. President, I simply say that at best this is the wrong time and the wrong place for the U.S. Senate to be spending its time on this particular matter.

Let me just sum up, if I might, Mr. President, by saying I think that while this amendment is not intended as such, this is a mischievous resolution, mischievous in about every way that you could imagine, if you look at what is in the national security interests of the United States. It is mischievous because I think few of us fully understand what is the motivation behind this resolution. I suspect you could dismiss that and say the motivation is that if genocide happened last year, or 80 years ago, why should not the U.S. Senate jump in and say that was a bad thing to do?

As the Senator from West Virginia has clearly indicated, we do not know for sure what happened. If for no other reason, that should give us pause to having a chance of this passing the U.S. Senate. So I simply say, Mr. President, I cannot think of a better word than "mischievous," and I think that is putting it mildly, which is a key point that I make. It is mischievous from a whole series of areas. Most important, it is probably an understatement, but I think it is extremely mischievous from the standpoint of the national security interests of the free world.

I hope that my colleagues will consider this very carefully before they vote to support Senate Joint Resolution 212. I thank the Chair. I thank my friend from West Virginia, and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Arizona is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DECONCINI. I thank the Chair and I thank my friend from West Virginia. I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak for a few minutes today on Senator DOLE's resolution commemorating the 75th anniversary of the tragic genocide of the Armenians by the Government of the Ottoman Empire between 1915 and 1923.

During these years hundreds of thousands of Armenians were systematically killed by a government which opposed their political views and their religion. It is an event which has been heatedly debated over the years and subjected to many unfortunate and confusing claims and counterclaims.

Historians may argue, yet they cannot deny the facts. In a time of chaos, social strife, and political upheaval, the Government of the Ottoman Empire—the "sick man of Europe"—was crumbling. It had overestimated its ability to control the territories it had conquered. The Empire was breaking up, but still it tried desperately to cling to its holdings in Eastern Europe. This was the historical context in which the Ottoman Government allowed the killing of thousands—perhaps even 1.5 million—Armenian men, women, and children in and around their villages between the Black and Caspian Seas. They were herded together and forced to march into exile in Syria. These poor Christians were left without food, water, or shelter. They were left defenseless during their long march before lawless gangs. Also, during this difficult time of global war, thousands of Turks and others under the umbrella of the Ottoman Empire also lost their lives.

The Ottoman Government had a long history of religious and ethnic hatred of the Armenians. As we have recently witnessed in Soviet Armenia and Azerbaijan, as well as other places too numerous to mention, these instances of religious and ethnic animosity continue to this day.

One of the most quoted documents from that time of turmoil is the telegram sent by the U.S. Ambassador to the Ottoman Government, Henry Morgenthau, to the Secretary of State on July 16, 1915. It states:

> Deportation of and excesses against peaceful Armenians is increasing and from harrowing reports of eye witnesses it appears that a campaign of race extermination is in progress under a pretext of reprisal against a rebellion. Protests as well as threats are unavailing and probably incite the Ottoman government to more drastic measures as they are determined to disclaim responsibility for their absolute disregard of capitulations and I believe nothing short of actual force which obviously United States are not in a position to exert would adequately meet the situation. Suggest you inform belligerent nations and mission boards of this.

Beginning in 1915 and continuing for the next 8 years, a campaign of violence and fear was carried out in Armenia and other parts of the Ottoman Empire. The violence was so intense that on May 11, 1920, our predecessors in this body, after hearings by the Senate Subcommittee on Foreign Relations, passed Senate Resolution 359, a resolution condemning the massacre of the Armenian people.

At that time, the term "genocide" did not exist. It was not until 1946 that Raphael Lemkin coined the term "genocide" in reaction to both the Holocaust in Germany as well as the events in Armenia. Eli Weisel, the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council Chairman, has spoken out about the massacre of the Armenians and the Board of the Holocaust Memorial here in Washington has determined that the genocide of the Armenians should also be commemorated as part of that special museum.

In the past, the House and Senate have considered and passed resolutions commemorating the tragic events in Armenia and elsewhere. On April 8, 1975, a resolution on the Armenian genocide introduced by Congressman Helstoski and Congressman Tip O'Neill was passed under suspension of the House rules by a vote of 332 to 55. Then, on September 10, 1984, a nearly identical resolution was passed by the House under suspension by a voice vote.

In the 98th Congress, I was a cosponsor of another Armenian resolution. Senate Resolution 241, introduced by Senator LEVIN on October 7, 1983, expressed the sense of the Senate that the foreign policy of the United States should take into account the genocide of the Armenian people. That resolution was reported by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and was placed on the Senate Calendar, but was never considered by the full Senate.

In addition to the Senate resolution passed 70 years ago, the Congress each year has passed a resolution calling for a day of remembrance for the victims of the Holocaust. At that ceremony in the Capitol Rotunda, we pledge "never to forget" the Holocaust of the Jews. It was also at that ceremony in 1981 that Eli Wiesel pledged to remember the Armenians because he knows that "no one remembered the Jews." As he stated on that day, "Rejected by everyone, they felt expelled from history."

Congress has not been the only branch of government which has spoken with a strong voice on this issue. Presidents from Benjamin Harrison to Ronald Reagan, including William Howard Taft, Woodrow Wilson, Warren G. Harding, Herbert Hoover, and Jimmy Carter have issued statements and proclamations deploring the loss of life under the Ottoman Government. As former President Reagan said so eloquently,

> Like the genocide of the Armenians before it, and the genocide of the Cambodians which followed it—and like too many other such persecutions of too many other peoples—the lessons of the Holocaust must never be forgotten.

I have spoken on at least two occasions with the Turkish Ambassador and I have assured him that my strong support for Turkey will continue. My intention in supporting this resolution is not to embarrass the Turkish people, or harm our relationship. I sincerely hope that this will not occur.

But we have to look history square in the face if we do not want to repeat the tragic mistakes of the past. The German Government of Conrad Adenauer had to face the facts of the Holocaust under the Nazi government and say "never again." The United States had to face that racial injustices it had perpetuated for most of its history before it could enact civil rights legislation.

Should we make an exception for past human rights abuses that occurred under the Ottoman Empire? I say we should not.

In conclusion, I would like to note that this resolution is supported by the American Hebrew Congregation and the Churches for Middle East Peace, a coalition of churches including the American Baptist Churches, U.S.A., the Episcopal Church, the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), and the National Council of Churches.

I want to congratulate Senator DOLE and my colleagues who are supporting him in this effort. I urge the Senate to once again stand firmly on the side of respect for human rights and vote for this resolution when the time comes.

In summary, Mr. President, I have been and will continue to be a strong supporter of the Republic of Turkey. Last year in the Appropriations Committee, I offered two amendments to attempt to add additional funds to the Republic of Turkey for their humanitarian actions toward refugees. One amendment that was adopted with the assistance of the President pro tempore was for $10 million to deal with the Bulgarian Turks that were being expelled from Bulgaria. This is a tremendous human rights violation in itself. The other amendment was for $5 million which we added in the Senate to assist the Turks because of their humanitarian approach in accepting the Kurds fleeing from chemical warfare by Iraq. President Ozal stuck his neck out for an unpopular ethnic group to help the Kurds that fled Iraq during the war. I also supported Turkish military funding last year and intend to support the military again this year. I am, however, going to vote for cloture so that we might get this resolution before us.

I think, Mr. President, we are getting a little bit off the track here. We are letting—the Turkish lobby, and they have a right to lobby, and Turkish Government officials, who have lobbied me, which they have every right to do—we are letting them say that if we pass this we are waiving a red flag; that we are insulting them; that we are slapping a friend in the face. I submit that that is not what we are doing. We are talking to friends. If we cannot talk to friends about history, if we cannot be realistic about the history of our own country, about the tragedies our Government perpetrated toward the native Americans, about the tragedy toward blacks, about admitting those things and being willing to say, yes, we made mistakes, then what kind of a democracy are we? If another government wants to pass a resolution saying we made mistakes, are we going to say, "What are you doing, slapping us in the face?"

No. It is a reality, and that is what this resolution recognizes. It goes back to the inhumanity that occurred not under this Turkish Government, not by these Turkish people, but by an Ottoman Empire that was carried away with itself, that was willing to starve 1½ million men, women, and children and march them 1,000 miles, and allow them to die. They died because nobody gave a darn, nobody gave them any food. The Ottoman Government wanted them to die.

Now, the President pro tempore is right; we are not here to judge or to determine genocide. I do not think we are determining genocide by this resolution. Let me read the resolution. It is very clear. It says that "April 24, 1990, is designated as a National Day of Remembrance of the 75th Anniversary of the Armenian Genocide of 1915 to 1923."

We make reference to what I think is a genocide. Now, we are not a court of law chosen to prosecute somebody. This is not a statement that we are bringing charges against anybody, not even the old Ottoman Empire. That Empire no longer exists.

The resolution further states that "the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe this day as a day of remembrance of the 1½ million people of Armenian ancestry who were victims of the genocide perpetrated by the Ottoman Empire from 1915 to 1923." Again, this has nothing to do with the present Turkish Republic.

The resolution continues, "Prior to the establishment of the Republic of Turkey, and in their memory, this date is commemorated by all Armenians and their friends throughout the world."

I am one of those friends of the Armenians as is everybody else in this Chamber. For it to be said that by voting to bring this resolution up or to cut off debate, we are somehow dismantling NATO, that we are destroying a relationship, is nonsense.

Turkey is a big country. It is a democracy. It has problems just like we do. It can take any criticism of its history. The democracy of today had nothing to do with this history and there is no reason we should not go on record by recognizing this history.

If you think of this tragedy—and nobody denies the tragedy occurred—why do we not want to stand up and say that we know it was a tragedy? Indeed, we should go on record expressing the view of the Senate that this was a tragedy, that it was in our opinion, a genocide. We are not determining guilt. We are saying that in our opinion, these events should be memoralized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. DECONCINI. I ask unanimous consent that I have 2 more minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have no objection under the same terms and circumstances which were earlier outlined.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will be recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. DECONCINI. I thank the Chair.

Let me say in conclusion, Mr. President, I hope that this great body can continue its long history of facing humanitarian and human rights issues because the head of one government says that this is insulting to us, that this is not going to improve our relationship. What are we to do if tomorrow the Government of Korea or the Government of the Philippines or some other friendly government takes some atrocious action toward its people in violation of human rights? Are we going to say, "My gosh, we cannot do anything; we cannot pass a resolution."

No; we have passed resolutions in the past, many resolutions. We have gone forward expressing our view on the Holocaust time and time again, and there is no reason that we cannot now express our views. Human rights is what makes this great democracy. I believe it has had an important and significant effect on the changes we are seeing in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. The United States has never altered its human rights position in that part of the world. We have done it toward China. Goodness knows, we have seen that. Now we are afraid, I think, to say what history says and to resurrect something that is difficult for us to think about. Not to point the finger at the present Turkish Government or the people there, but to say up front that this was a tragedy, that it was a genocide in our opinion, that we want to memorialize that day, so that, God forbid, this will not happen again. Is that not what we are here for? Is that not really what human rights is about?

I hope that the Senate will express itself on this issue. I reiterate that this resolution has no bearing on our good relationship with the Turkish Government and the Turkish people.

I thank the Chair and I thank the President pro tempore for letting me speak at this time. I also thank the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Illinois is recognized for 8 minutes.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President and my colleagues, no matter what happens on this vote, I think something good has happened in that we have had a real discussion for the first time that I can remember on this whole question of the slaughter of innocent Armenians. If the Turkish Government, candidly, had had the good judgment just to let this pass quietly, no one would have paid any attention to this particular resolution. I think they made a mistake. I think they made a mistake tactfully also because, frankly, all nations, virtually all nations, make mistakes. We have done it. We have had slavery in this country. We have abused American Indians, our native Americans. We perpetrated a horrible deed against Japanese-Americans back in 1942. We are not accusing the present Government of Turkey or the people of Turkey today of having done this deed, but let us not ignore history.

I have great respect for my distinguished colleague from West Virginia when he says we are politicans, not historians. The Senator from West Virginia is both a politician and a historian. The Senator from Kansas is both. I have even written a little bit in the field of history myself. But let us just assume that none of us is a historian. While it is true we are politicians rather than historians, I think it is also true, as Harry Truman told us, that politicians dare not ignore history. That is really the question that we confront.

Let us not ignore history, not on the question of the Armenians. There is a book which I would recommend to my colleagues, written by a Presbyterian by the name of David S. Wyman. It is called "Abandonment of the Jews."

It tells what happened in this country in the late 1930's and early 1940's—how we did not stand up as people, Jews and Christians, as we should have, in behalf of the Jews in Germany and Poland and that area. Let us not repeat history. That is what this resolution is asking very simply.

I hear a lot of talk about the national interest. All of us are interested in the national interest. But the national interest is best served when we stand up for the ideals of this Nation. And you can go through history and see that time and time again.

Let me tell you a story that Clark Clifford, the distinguished attorney here in Washington, formerly counsel to Harry Truman, tells. Harry Truman was President of the United States, and the Secretary of State, General Marshall, came in and said,"We should not recognize Israel." And he went through the numbers in the Middle East. President Truman thanked him, and then the Secretary of War—we now call it the Secretary of Defense—James Forrestal, came in. He said the security interests of this country are very, very clear. He went through the numbers and said we should not recognize Israel. After both of them had left, Harry Truman turned to Clark Clifford and said, "You do not decide issues like this on the basis of numbers. You decide issues like this on the basis of right and wrong."

My friends, I believe that. I believe that strongly.

I think clearly you had a people, and there was a genocide. We can argue about it. But genocide is an attempt to eliminate a people. That happened. Fortunately, in the case of the Armenians, it was not successful. But there was a massive slaughter. We do not know the precise number, but there was a massive slaughter of people. We are saying let us not forget that.

I have heard the argument: Well, Turkey has problems with refugees from Bulgaria and other things. It is really not an issue here. I heard my colleague, Senator DECONCINI, say he would support aid to Turkey for the refugees. So will I. I would like to see Turkey move a little more constructively working with Greece and working with the Government of Cyprus to get the Cyprus situation solved. But I am willing to vote tomorrow.

The distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee comes in here, and says we need more dollars for refugees for Bulgaria and Turkey. I am going to be there voting for it. That is not the question. Nor is the question the numbers involved. There are not very many Armenians in the United States. There are not very many Armenians in West Virginia, Michigan, Illinois, Nevada, or any of the States. There are not very many Turks. The question is not numbers. The question is, what is right and wrong.

I think clearly it is right for us to stand up and say let us remember these innocent people who were slaughtered; not just to remember them but to remind ourselves how inhuman humanity can be once in awhile.

I hope we will adopt the motion for cloture and, if we can, adopt the resolution.

I yield the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBB). The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I thank the Chair, and I thank my good friend from West Virginia for also yielding and interrupting his own speech to make it possible for us to interject a few thoughts and words.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will my friend yield to the Senator who has the floor for just a couple of minutes to respond to my good friend from Illinois?

Mr. LEVIN. Of course.

Mr. BYRD. The distinguished Senator from Illinois is a good man. He is a good Senator. He was a good Member of the House of Representatives. And he puts forth an argument that it is difficult to assail when he says the question is what is right and what is wrong.

Again, Mr. President, may I say to my dear friend that that is not the point. If that were the point, Mr. President, we would be discussing the business of the courts of this land as to who shot whom, who stole what from whom, who was right and who was wrong.

But unlike the English parliamentary system in which the great council, originally the Anglo-Saxon wit en ag emote, later the magnum Presidium, the great council of thanes and earls and barons, constituted parliament in its early and fluid beginnings. There was a smaller council that was a permanent council that was also called the curia regis but to whom a great council met.

It later became what is called the parliament.

In the years 1341, 1339–1341, parliament became a bicameral body when the knights and the burgesses split off from the ecclesiastical lay lords and began holding their separate meetings to decide decisions separately in Westminster Abbey. And the ecclesiastical lay lords continued to meet in the parliament and in the halls of parliament.

So that great council was the judicial body, and the House of Lords in England continues to be the highest court in the land. They decide on great problems.

But in the United States the upper body of the legislature is not a court. We do not decide what is right and what is wrong. Our constitutional forbears provided for that instrument when they created the Supreme Court consisting at that time of six members, and provided for a court system. The Senators in the first Congress created that Supreme Court. As they fulfilled their role under the Constitution, they created the Supreme Court of six members, and they created certain courts and district courts to determine what is right and what is wrong.

So under our system of parliamentary law and under our parliamentary system, the only time the Senate deems what is right and what is wrong is when it acts as the court in a trial of impeachment, and also when it acts under the Constitution to expel another Member by a two-thirds vote. Then to agree, it determines what is right and what is wrong.

We are not here today, Mr. President, to determine what is right and what is wrong, unlike the British House of Lords. That is the point I keep trying to make.

I agree with my friend from Illinois, who has a big heart and who is a compassionate man, that based on what I have been able to read and hear, there were some atrocious things that happened in the period which this resolution covers. So there is no argument there. Those things are wrong. Thou shalt not kill.

But, Mr. President, we are not here to determine what is right and what is wrong. That is for the court to do. We have created an instrument under the Genocide Convention to determine what is right and what is wrong; what will be designated as genocide and what will not; what country, what group will be charged with the crime of genocide.

I am simply saying to my friend from Illinois that I agree that what was done was wrong, but that is not the point here. The point is, is this Senate going to set itself up as the instrument whereby genocide is to be determined and where the crime of genocide is to be determined, whether the nation or group that commits the crime is to be labeled and is to be accused of a crime called genocide?

Mr. SIMON. Will my colleague yield for a brief response to his statement?

Mr. BYRD. May I yield to the Senator from Michigan, and I hope that he will in turn yield on my time to the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. If I may have 2 minutes from my friend from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. SIMON. The distinguished President pro tempore has just to some extent negated his earlier statement saying we are politicians, not historians, when he goes through history. And earlier today, I happened to be on the floor when I heard him refer to Aaron Burr, and he said: I did not serve in the Senate with Aaron Burr. But he speaks about that time period almost as if he served with Aaron Burr.

I agree with much of what my distinguished leader says when he talks about our being a court. But, in fact, we decide issues of right and wrong day after day after day. We sit as a court not only when we impeach, but when, for example, we voted reparations for Japanese-Americans, we in fact made a decision of what was right and wrong, and we do that every day in this body. We make these judgments.

I think here again on this issue, we have to assume some historical judgments, and I think the historical evidence is overwhelming, and that is that in this period genocide occurred. We ought to adopt this resolution on that basis.

I thank the distinguished President pro tempore, and I thank my colleague from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. First, it should be clear, Mr. President, from the wording of the resolution itself, that this resolution is reaching a conclusion to commemorate events which occurred before the existence of the Republic of Turkey. This makes no judgment relative to the Republic of Turkey whatsoever. It reaches a judgment by its own terms on events from 1915 to 1923—I am quoting from the resolution—"prior to the establishment of the Republic of Turkey."

Why the current Turkish Government opposes this resolution is not clear. Whatever their reasons or motives, they are surely not binding on us or the rest of the world. They are a good ally. Germany is a good ally. The current German Government did not oppose the commemoration of the Holocaust.

Would we be bound in any way or feel somehow or other we could not commemorate the Holocaust if the current German Government opposed that commemoration in the United States? The current German Government does not oppose recognition or commemoration of the Holocaust. They have acknowledged it. The world is better off with that acknowledgment. NATO is better off with that acknowledgment.

The world would be better off if the current Government of Turkey either acknowledged this genocide or took no position in opposition to other people commemorating this genocide. Surely, we are not bound by its decision to oppose our joining in the commemoration of a historical event, something which occurred.

The evidence is overwhelming that there was a genocide against the Armenian people during the years 1915 to 1923. There is evidence in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the in Presidential archives, in the ambassadorial archives in the State Department. There is evidence in the German archives. There is evidence in the European Community. There is evidence everywhere.

Senator King, in 1920, before the Senate adopted a resolution on this matter, quoted from a telegram that he had received in which the writer, a witness, said that the Turkish Government is "executing their purpose to destroy the Armenian people," and that "it is a pitiful thing to see an entire people destroyed."

Shortly following that, the Congress adopted a resolution, Senate Resolution 359, on May 11, 1920, which stated that the hearings conducted by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations have clearly established the truth of the reported massacre and other atrocities from which the Armenian people have suffered.

The person who headed the German Embassy's Armenian desk at the time in Istanbul wrote his Government that Turkey was "intent on taking advantage of the war in order to thoroughly liquidate its internal foes without thereby being disturbed by foreign intervention."

Another German Vice Consul in Turkey said that: "Measures undertaken by the Turkish Government are tantamount to the total destruction of the Armenians." These are contemporaneous statements by officials of other governments.

We have thousands of eyewitnesses who survived the million or more who died. The million or more did not survive to describe it. But others did, and we have that testimony, and it has been acknowledged over and over again by this Government and by Presidents of this Government that there was a genocide against the Armenian people.

This Senate has acknowledged that there was a genocide against the Jewish people. We reached a judgment on that. It was called the Holocaust. We created a Holocaust Memorial Council. We have reached a judgment even though some deny the existence of the Holocaust that in fact the Holocaust existed.

Our Government repeatedly, our Presidents, repeatedly have acknowledged the existence of a genocide against the Armenian people. And this resolution simply commemorates that genocide.

Winston Churchill wrote in 1929 the following:

> In 1915 the Turkish Government began and carried out the infamous general massacre and deportation of Armenians in Asia Minor and the clearance of the race from Asia Minor was about as complete of such an act, on a scale so great, could be.

Then he wrote the following:

There is no reasonable doubt that this crime was planned and executed for political reasons.

That is Winston Churchill in 1929.

Our consul, a man named Jackson, wrote contemporaneously that there was an effort to "extinguish the Armenian race."

These are contemporaneous comments by officials who are either our officials, or Winston Churchill, or even officials that were connected to the Government of Germany.

President Reagan, in commemorating the Days of Remembrance of Victims of the Holocaust made reference to the genocide of the Armenians when he said:

Like the genocide of the Armenians before it, and the genocide of the Cambodians which followed it, and like too many other such persecutions of too many other peoples, the lessons of the Holocaust must never be forgotten.

A Presidential reference to the genocide of the Armenians.

The U.S. Holocaust Council, created by the Congress, has approved the inclusion of the "Armenian genocide" in the museum that is being built right next to the Mall here in our Nation's Capital.

The American Bar Association has recognized it. In February 1988 they submitted to our Judiciary Committee a statement in support of the implementation legislation for the Genocide Convention which has now been approved, in which the American Bar Association said that:

As familiar as we are with the historic examples of genocide against the Armenians and the Jews, genocide is a contemptible crime of shocking magnitude, and we must prepare ourselves to fight it.

The European Parliament has adopted the following statement:

It believes that the tragic events of 1915 to 1917 involving the Armenians living in the territory of the Ottoman Empire constitute genocide within the meaning of convention on the prevention and the punishment of the crime of genocide adopted by the U.N. General Assembly.

That is the statement of our other European allies, part of NATO, which is the European Parliament, and they have indicated that the failure of Turkey to acknowledge this genocide is an "insurmountable obstacle" to Turkey's admission to the European Community at that time. These are allies of ours. Indeed, these are allies of Turkey as Turkey is an ally of ours and will remain so.

So there are people who have been in these key positions who have rendered judgments based on personal firsthand knowledge, based on documents. I have done a tremendous amount of reading in this area, and I think many of us have in this body. Each of us are going to reach his or her own conclusion as to whether or not it is appropriate that we commemorate the Armenian genocide.

Our Ambassador to Turkey, Ambassador Morgenthau, back in 1915, telegrammed the Secretary of State:

Deportation of and excesses against peaceful Armenians is increasing and from harrowing reports of eye witnesses it appears that a campaign of race extermination is in progress under a pretext of reprisal against rebellion.

In his book, our Ambassador to Turkey said:

When the Turkish authorities gave the orders for these deportations, they were merely giving the death warrant to a whole race; they understood this well and in their conversations with me, they made no particular attempt to conceal the fact.

Our Congress, our Presidents, Ambassadors, the European Parliament, President Reagan, the Holocaust Council, on and on. The evidence is there.

Mr. President, there are those who would rather not be reminded of this tragedy. Sadly, Orwell's vision of history being rewritten for the convenience of current geopolitical strategy has become a modern day reality and I wonder what future historians will say of this practice. George Santayana gave dire warning that those who do not learn from history are doomed to repeat it, has proven all too true over this century.

We have not learned from our mistakes and history has been repeated. The Armenians were the first people to suffer genocide in this century but not the last. The Ukrainians, under Stalin, the Jews under Hitler, the Cambodians under Pol Pot offer mute testimonials to the price of ignoring history.

I just pray that never will more names be added to this ignoble list. That is why it is so important to join in this commemoration to remember this historic event.

We must not forget the lessons of the past no matter how uncomfortable they make us. We must confront the horrors of the past and vow not to repeat mistakes and never let these tragedies such as the Armenians suffered ever happen again.

Mr. President, Hitler asked, when he was planning the final solution to the Jews, "Who remembers the Armenians?" Let us prove Hitler wrong again and by adoption of this resolution remember the Armenian genocide.

Again, I want to thank my friend from West Virginia for yielding to me for a few minutes. I appreciate his willingness to interrupt his own remarks to allow some of us to speak.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I understand my good friend and distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] wishes me to yield to him. I yield to him for such time he may desire, 10 minutes or more if he needs it under the same terms and conditions that have prevailed today in the course of my yielding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today, we are asking the Senate to take the long overdue step of providing a simple measure of justice and remembrance for the Armenian people who died in their homeland in one of the worst atrocities of the 20th century.

I support the Armenian genocide resolution, and I am proud to be among the sponsors of this proposal to designate April 24, 1990, as the national day of remembrance for the 1.5 million people of Armenian ancestry who died between 1915 and 1923.

It is fitting on this 75th anniversary of the beginning of this monumental massacre that the U.S. Senate should at long last commemorate the suffering of the Armenians.

In so doing, we are following the wise example already set by others in the world community. In August 1985, the United Nations Subcommittee on Human Rights recognized the tragedy which befell the Armenian people earlier in this century. In June 1987, the European Parliament did so as well.

It is regrettable that the United States—a country which prides itself on its traditions of liberty and justice—should take so long to recognize the suffering of a people who have contributed so much to our own Nation.

America is blessed with an extraordinary Armenian heritage. The Armenian commitment to hard work and dedication to family reflect essential American values. Armenian-Americans are eminent in many fields and have enriched every State in our American Union. The resolution before us is an appropriate demonstration of our appreciation of the outstanding accomplishments of the Armenian people and a clear statement that we remember their suffering.

I urge the Senate not to ignore the savage cruelty that Armenians have suffered in the past. Few peoples in the history of the Earth have endured so much murderous persecution for their faith, or borne their enormous tragedy with such great courage.

We must not forget the cruel truth of Armenian suffering.

We must not forget the 1½ million men, women, and children who perished in their homeland at the beginning of this century under an empire that has long ceased to exist, but that was responsible for one of the worst crimes against humanity in recorded history.

As the writer H.G. Wells observed, "Human history becomes more and more a race between education and catastrophe." That is why the Armenian genocide resolution in Congress is so important. Unless America speaks the truth, unless the world comes to terms in the present with the horrors of the past, we may well stand condemned to repeat those horrors in the future. we must not let that happen.

Reminding our own day and generation of man's past inhumanity to man is our best hope to prevent similar atrocities in the future, and to avoid what could be the ultimate atrocity for all humanity—a nuclear catastrophe.

This commemoration in no way reflects adversely on the Republic of Turkey or our friends, the Turkish people. To the contrary, it is a recognition of events in the final brutal years of the Ottoman Empire, over which no person or country existing today had any control.

America at its best has always stood for the great goals of liberty and justice. Tolerance and compassion, human rights and human dignity—for our own citizens and for all peoples everywhere. We must never be silent or avert our eyes in the face of the cruelty and suffering, the bigotry and repression that still infect too much of our planet, and that cast such a deep shadow over the dream we share of peace on Earth.

In recognizing the tragic suffering of the Armenian people, we can do our part to insure against atrocities in the future. At a time when deplorable new examples of murderous discrimination against the long-suffering Armenian people are all too familiar in the world, it is especially appropriate for the Senate to go on record in support of the Armenian genocide resolution and I urge the Senate to approve it.

I thank the Senator from West Virginia and I yield back what time I did not use.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I understand the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. SARBANES] wishes to speak at this time. How much time would the Senator like?

Mr. SARBANES. I think 6 minutes would probably be sufficient.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, may I say that I am not acting as a traffic cop on the floor today. I came to the floor quite some time ago with a speech that is 65 pages in length or so and I have used 11 pages. I say that only to explain that I do not intend to be here all day. But I am very happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. SARBANES]. I yield to him for 10 minutes, more than that if he wishes, under the same terms and conditions by which I have yielded previously today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia yields to the Senator from Maryland for such time as he may require.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I appreciate the courtesy of the very distinguished Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. President, I rise in support of the resolution that is before us. I very much hope that the Senate will in the next day decide to move to consider the substance of this resolution. At the moment, we are simply engaged in the debate over whether to proceed. I think we should proceed to the resolution. I think we should consider it and I think we should pass it.

Mr. President, 75 years ago this coming April began one of the great martyrdoms of modern history. In an age which is tragically inured to acts of barbarism, we consider here the systematic and methodical campaign in 1915 to exterminate an innocent people, the Armenians living within the borders of the Ottoman Empire. That terrible campaign meant the death of 1½ million men, women, and children, and suffering almost beyond description for those who survived it. Anyone who has talked with the survivors of that genocide knows from their descriptions of the unspeakable horrors, virtually impossible to describe that were experienced by 1½ million people.

On the night of April 23-24, 1915, 75 years ago—75 years ago—the intellectual, religious and political leaders of the Armenian people were summarily arrested in Istanbul, to be sent to exile and death. Those arrests were quickly followed in every Armenian community by the arrests of local leader, the segregation of Armenian soldiers into separate battalions which were then condemned to death, and the deportation of entire Armenian communities, defenseless women and children, into the remote deserts in the eastern region of Anatolia.

This campaign against the Armenian people occurred in the face of a world opinion that unfortunately was largely indifferent. It did not pass unnoticed however, and the historical record cannot be rewritten. It should be a matter of deep concern to all of us that in recent years an effort has developed, not in this Chamber so much, but elsewhere, in effect to revise or rewrite the history of this tragic period and to blur our understanding of the full tragedy of the massacres we must remind ourselves after all, that once we acquiesce to the revision of the historical version and one period, we open the doors to revisions of the record of others.

But the documentary essence of the Armenian tragedy exists, we have numerous exhibits of contemporaneous newspaper articles from the New York Times, and other major newspapers as well. The British press, the French press, and so forth.

Let me read just a sampling of the headlines from mid-1915: "More Armenian Massacres;" "Armenian Horrors Grow"; "Tales of Armenian Horrors Confirmed"; "800,000 Armenians Counted Destroyed"; "Spare Armenians, Pope Asks Sultan"; "Massacres Renew, Morgenthau Reports"; "Thousands Protest Armenian Murders." These headlines alone speak volumes.

Our Ambassador to the Ottoman Empire at the time was Henry Morgenthau, later a very distinguished Secretary of the Treasury under President Franklin Roosevelt. Morgenthau has written at length about the genocide visited on the Armenians. In his book, he discussed the tragic events which we are talking about here today, and for which we are seeking this national day of remembrance. He said, and I quote him:

> Whenever crimes the most perverted instincts of the human mind can define and whatever refinements of persecutions and injustice the most debased imagination can conceive, became the daily misfortunes of this devoted people. I am confident that the whole history of the human race contains no such horrible episode as this. The great massacres and persecutions of the past seem almost insignificant when compared to the sufferings of the Armenian race in 1915. The killing of the Armenian people was accompanied by the systematic destruction of churches, schools, libraries, treasures of art and of history, in an attempt to eliminate all traces of a noble civilization some 3,000 years old.

What Ambassador Morgenthau wrote in the years following the great tragedy was consonant with his reporting at the time the events took place. For on July 16 of the first year of the massacres, 1915, he sent the following message by telegraph to the Secretary of State:

> Deportation of and excesses against peaceful Armenians is increasing and from harrowing reports of eyewitnesses it appears that a campaign of race extermination is in progress under pretext of reprisal against rebellion.

Reports to Ambassador Morgenthau by consul generals in the field, consular dispatches, substantiated the Ambassador's experience of what was taking place with respect to the massacre of the Armenians.

We know, and it has been alluded to here, that the European parliament has passed a resolution on this matter; that the United Nations Commission on Human Rights has passed a resolution reaffirming the Armenian genocide as a historical fact; and that the United Nations Commission on Human Rights has recognized the Armenian genocide in its report.

Perhaps Elie Wiesel expressed most eloquently for us the critical importance of recognizing the Armenian genocide when in April 1981 he spoke at a Holocaust memorial service, the Days of Remembrance, here in this Capitol Building.

At that solemn ceremony of remembrance—remembrance of past horror, he said:

> Before the planning of the final solution, Hitler asked, "Who remembers the Armenians?" He was right. No one remembered them. As no one remembered the Jews. Rejected by everyone, they felt expelled from history.

As our very distinguished colleague from Michigan stated only a few minutes ago, the purpose of remembrance, of refusing to forget, is to make certain that we are not doomed to repeat the past. Those who do not learn from history are doomed to repeat it.

That is why, as part of coming to terms with ourselves, we seek to acknowledge what has occurred in the past. We cannot turn our backs on history. Coming to terms with the past is part of building for the future.

We have sought to do that in our own country. Much of our own history is an effort to come to terms with the past; who would now urge us to otherwise? We have struggled to come to terms with slavery. In recent years we have sought to come to terms with the treatment of Japanese-Americans at the beginning of World War II. With respect to native Americans we have begun to acknowledge a brutal history that was ignored too long. Facing history is indeed a matter of facing ourselves.

Would the West Germans be better off today had they not come to terms with the Holocaust? And does that challenge not lie ahead for the East Germans, whose postwar history has largely overlooked it as they seek to become part of a modern democratic society?

The resolution before us promotes sober reflection, not only on the Armenian tragedy, but on broader questions of aggression and inhumanity. I cannot understand why our acknowledgement of a day of remembrance, our recognition of an historical event, does not give us a foundation for moving ahead. In my view, one of the most important aspects of this resolution is that it would establish that foundation.

There have been other occasions on which this Senate has affirmed the proposition that the actions taken against the Armenian people constituted genocide.

In fact, in April 1981, on the day of remembrance of victims of the Holocaust, President Reagan issued a proclamation in which he stated,

> Like the genocide of the Armenians before it, and the genocide of the Cambodians which followed it, and like too many other such persecutions of too many other people, the lessons of the Holocaust must never be forgotten.

We should not now be deterred by the emergence of a handful of revisionist historians who seek to deny a well-documented historical event. There are a handful of revisionist historians who are trying today to deny the authenticity of the Holocaust. Ten years from now, 20 years from now, will we be asked to accept their arguments that contemporary accounts are to be denied, that the record is not as clear as it seems?

This resolution makes clear, by establishing a National Day of Remembrance on the 75th anniversary of the Armenian genocide, that the human tragedy which occurred beginning in 1915, terrible almost beyond description, will not be forgotten.

I strongly urge my colleagues to vote to consider the substance of the resolution when the motion to proceed is before us tomorrow, and then to move forward from there to pass this resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia retains the floor.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have promised to yield to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas with the understanding that I not lose my right to the floor, the understanding that the statement of the Senator from Arkansas not to show as an interruption in the RECORD, and that I not be charged with a second speech upon resuming my speech once the Senator yields.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from West Virginia yields to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I will be rather brief because I see other Senators on the floor wishing to speak on one side or the other on this issue.

Mr. President, first of all let me say when I was first presented this resolution for cosponsoring, I almost immediately signed on. I considered it a commemorative resolution which most of us around here sign without really giving much thought to it.

At the time, I thought the resolution was designed simply to commemorate the suffering of the Armenians. And they have indeed, suffered greatly. And if that were what the resolution said, then I would continue to cosponsor it, and strongly support it. Sadly, that is not the case.

I did not come from a family where my parents told me to eat everything on my plate and think about the starving Armenians. My parents did not know where Armenia was, and they knew little or nothing about their suffering in that period, between 1915 and 1923.

I would not for an instant try to revise history by suggesting that the Armenians did not suffer a terrible, terrible injustice. They did, and there were great atrocities. There was a revolution going on, and I would leave it to the scholars to come to a definitive, scholarly conclusion about that unhappy period in the history of Armenia and Armenians. Turkey was a part of the Ottoman Empire, described in the resolution. There is no question but many of us are opposing this resolution because we feel it is, an unjust attack on or insult to one of our strongest NATO allies, namely Turkey.

But it goes deeper than that. As I say, I think we are trying to make a scholarly determination here today, which this body is ill-equipped to make. But we are also being asked to indict present-day Turkey for what happened in that 8-year timeframe over 70 years ago.

As a matter of fact, I do not know whether it was 1915 to 1921 or 1915 to 1923. This resolution, I think, maybe adds a couple of years to it.

But, in any event, I have risen today to take my stand in opposition to the resolution because it has been 70 years since that happened.

There was a fight by the Armenians for independence and over a million Armenians lost their lives. As we all know now, of course, Kemal Ataturk became the first President of Turkey when the Ottoman Empire was broken up and Turkey and the U.S.S.R., as was not too uncommon in those days, just split Armenia up.

But the point I want to make is, there is another factor that disturbs me, and it is that we are asking this body to blame present-day Turkey and the Turkish people for what happened to Armenians many years ago.

I am a son of the South. But I never owned a slave. My father never owned a slave. The South paid a big price for its rebellion for an unjust cause. I always say about democracy, Mr. President: Just because we live by majority rule does not mean the majority is always right. Ninety-five percent of the people in the South thought slavery was a fine institution. But, bear in mind, the 95 percent I am talking about were white, were free men and women.

I think there is something basically unfair about a resolution that indicts modern Turkey and children and grandchildren of whoever might have committed those injustices. My sons, not necessarily my daughter, but my sons think it is a pretty big burden to be children of a Senator—at least until they need football tickets or something that they know I can usually provide them. But I do not want my children to suffer for my sins.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield? Would he feel the same way about Germany when we ratified the Genocide Convention in this Chamber about 2 years ago? I think the Senator voted for it. Or was that a different case?

Mr. BUMPERS. Absolutely.

Mr. DOLE. There were a million and a half Armenians slaughtered. I do not see any other difference. How can you say today, you do not want Turkish children to suffer for the sins of their fathers, and you say that is different from what we did about the German children of the perpetrators of the Holocaust?

I might add there are statements in the Genocide Convention debate which bring in Armenia—I want to refer to those statements and make them a part of the RECORD later—by a number of Senators on each side who said when we ratified that convention that we were not only talking about the Jews but the Armenians. I do not know how the Senator from Arkansas can make a distinction—maybe because Armenia is a small, powerless country. Maybe that is the distinction.

Mr. BUMPERS. I want to say to my colleague that if my vote for the Genocide Treaty said I was implicating the grandchildren of the people who committed atrocities in the past, then I will try to rescind my vote. I apologize for having voted for it if that is what that treaty said. But I'm sure the treaty didn't say that.

I took part in that debate. The Senator is perfectly welcome to look at my participation, though I am not sure I spoke on the floor. I know the Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Proxmire, spent his entire life in the Senate getting that treaty approved for ratification. But I also want to say that I did not interpret the Genocide Treaty as meaning anything except that we are opposed to genocide under any guise, and that we were not giving up any constitutional rights when we voted for the Genocide Treaty. Those were the issues on that as I recall.

Mr. DOLE. If the Senator will yield further, I think that is all we say on this commemorative resolution. In fact, we added a clause to make certain nobody can say it is the Turkish Republic. We are talking about the Ottoman Empire. That was added bcause we knew nobody in the Turkish Republic, the democracy, our friend, our ally was responsible. Keep in mind that the Ottomans were on the side of the Germans in World War I, not on our side. They were on the side of the Germans.

Mr. BUMPERS. We are now too, Senator.

Mr. DOLE. Pardon?

Mr. BUMPERS. We consider Germany probably the strongest ally, militarily, we have and yet we all recognize the Holocaust was perpetrated by the Nazi regime in Germany.

Mr. DOLE. That is because the Germans were willing to accept history. I do not know if the Turkish Republic is not responsible, why do they not say it is true? We are talking about right or wrong. That is all there is to it. Is it right?

I invite the Senator on his way out to read some of the stories from the New York Times—not stories from me—but read the headlines in the New York Times in 1915, 1916, 1917 when they drowned the people, when they starved the children. They say 800,000 exterminated. That is not my language, it is a news story.

Mr. BUMPERS. This a friendly debate and I am happy for you to discuss this. If I may just inject myself into this, this is what American scholars say about Armenian allegations. I guess it appears as an ad in the New York Times. I am sure the Senator has seen it. But here are a great number of the best scholars in the country.

Mr. DOLE. We already answered the scholar argument. It turns out there were not 69 real scholars on this issue.

Mr. BUMPERS. However many there are, there are obviously a lot of scholars in this country who feel they have not been given access to all the records they need in order to come to a definitive conclusion that you can consider this genocide. Genocide is probably as harsh a word as there is in the English language.

Mr. DOLE. It was not coined until 1946, after the Holocaust, after the Turkish slaughter of the Armenians, and we define genocide in the Genocide Convention. But we have addressed the question of these so-called 69 scholars. It turns out some are scholars of folklore and of carpets. Only about four or five knew anything about the Armenian genocide.

You also make reference to the archives that are open. The archives are not open. We addressed that issue yesterday.

I just say to the Senator from Arkansas who was a cosponsor of the resolution, we are prepared to even go further in an effort to satisfy some of the concerns, to not offend the Turkish Republic, by additional language that I will offer if I have the opportunity, if we have a right to proceed, and I hope the Senator will keep an open mind on that. I am only here to make a case.

It just happened that when I was majority leader, after 38 years, we brought up the Genocide Convention. It was brought up while I was majority leader; it was implemented by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, who was majority leader 2 years later. For 38 years, it languished around the Senate. Nobody wanted to touch it. They did not want to offend anybody. But we finally decided to do the right thing. That is all we are asking here. We are not picking a fight with the Turkish Republic.

Again, I submit, do not take my word for it. Read the stories, read the references the distinguished Senator from Illinois referred to. They are in the German archives, the Vatican archieves, United States archives. We have 25,000 pages on this period in our archives.

The Senator from West Virginia has as much as conceded these atrocities happened, and all we are saying is they happened, let us urge the American people to join those who believe they happened in commemorating April 24th as the Armenian martyrs day. I hope I can show the Senator the modified language.

Mr. BUMPERS. Let me say to the Senator, the Genocide Treaty was something I began to get mail on when I first came to the Senate from—you cannot call it anything else—right wingers who said this is a terrible violation of the U.S. Constitution. "We are giving up our rights under the Constitution to world courts" they wrote.

I read the Genocide Treaty and I could not find one thing in there that I objected to. One thing I also found was that hearings had been held on that treaty for 38 long years before we advised and consented to it. So far as I know, not one single hearing has ever been held on this resolution. I am not suggesting that if we had hearings that we could render a definitive conclusion. But I could tell you that if we had held hearings on it, in my opinion, the language of this resolution would not be the way it is right now.

Go ahead.

Mr. DOLE. I do not want to quarrel with the Senator. We are friends. I am not here to argue with anyone. I want to get back to the term "genocide." It was coined by Raphael Lemkin, a Holocaust survivor and attorney. He created the term genocide and applied the term to the Armenian atrocities. He developed a Genocide Convention on the basis of the Armenian and Jewish experience and he said it was important to outlaw genocide on an international basis.

I quote from an autobiography called "Totally Unofficial" of Raphael Lemkin:

> In 1915, the Germans occupied the city of W. and the entire area. I used this time to read more history, to study and to watch whether national, religious or racial groups are being destroyed. The truth came out only after the war. In Turkey, more than 1,200,000 Armenians were put to death for no other reason than they were Christians.

He want on to say:

> I identified myself more and more with the sufferings of the victims, whose numbers grew, as I continued my study of history. I understood that the function of memory is not only to register past events, but to stimulate human conscience. Soon contemporary examples of Genocide followed, such as the slaughter of the Armenians in 1915.

And again:

> • • • A bold plan was formulated in my mind. This consisted (of) obtaining the ratification by Turkey among the first twenty founding nations.
>
> This would be an atonement for the genocide of Armenians but how could this be achieved.

And so forth.

The only thing I want the RECORD to show is that the person who coined the term "genocide" said it applied to the Turkish atrocities, not just the Holocaust.

I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD a paper on this subject.

There being no objection, the paper was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RAPHEAL LEMKIN AND THE WORD GENOCIDE

Issue: Raphael Lemkin, a Holocaust survivor and attorney, created the term "genocide," and applied the term to the Armenian atrocities.

Points and Authorities

1. Raphael Lemkin coined the word genocide and applied it to the Armenian atrocities.

2. Lemkin developed the Genocide Convention on the basis of the Armenian and Jewish experience.

3. Lemkin showed that it was important to outlaw genocide on an international basis and to expose past horrors in order to prevent the recurrence of genocide.

ARMENIAN ASSEMBLY OF AMERICA FACT SHEET #8 RAPHAEL LEMKIN, THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE, AND THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Professor Raphael Lemkin, a lawyer who escaped Poland during the Nazi invasion of 1939, was the key figure in the history of making genocide a crime under international law. Having lost 49 members of his own family in the Holocaust, he coined the term "genocide" in 1944 and worked tirelessly until his death in 1959 toward the adoption of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide.

Having been profoundly affected by the extermination of the Armenians in Ottoman Turkey from 1915 to 1923, Lemkin first proposed "to declare the destruction of racial, religious, or social collectivities" an international crime at the International Conference on the Unification of Criminal Law held in Madrid under the auspices of the League of Nations in 1933. Although at first rejected, his proposal gained new significance after the destruction of European Jewry in World War II and lead to the drafting of the Genocide Convention by a United Nations committee in 1947-48.

After coining the term "genocide" to describe the deliberate destruction of a people, Lemkin became the first person to characterize the atrocities of 1915-23 as the "Armenian Genocide." In his decade-long effort to obtain ratification of the Genocide Convention, Lemkin repeatedly noted the Armenian Genocide, together with the Holocaust, as a prototype of the crime of genocide.

Quotations by Raphael Lemkin:

(1) From letter to Mrs. Thelma Stevens, Methodist Women's Council, July 26, 1950:

"This Convention is a matter of conscience and is a test of our personal relationship to evil. I know it is very hot in July and August for work and planning, but without becoming sentimental or trying to use colorful speech, let us not forget that the heat of this month is less unbearable to us than the heat in the ovens of Auschwitz and Dachau and more lenient than the murderous heat in the desert of Aleppo which burned to death the bodies of hundreds of thousands of Christian Armenian victims of genocide in 1915."

(2) From Totally Unofficial, the autobiography (unpublished) of Raphael Lemkin:

(a) "In 1915, the Germans occupied the city of W. and the entire area. I used this time to read more history, to study and to watch whether national, religious or racial groups are being destroyed. The truth came out only after the war. In Turkey, more than 1,200,000 Armenians were put to death for no other reason than they were Christians. . . After the end of the war, some 150 Turkish war criminals were arrested and interned by the British Government on the island of Malta. The Armenians sent a delegation to the peace conference at Versailles. They were demanding justice. Then one day, the delegation read in the newspapers that all Turkish war criminals were released. I was shocked. A nation was killed and the guilty persons were set free. Why is a man punished when he kills another man? Why is the killing of a million a lesser crime than the killing of a single individual? (p. 12)

(b) "I identified myself more and more with the suffering of the victims, whose numbers grew, as I continued my study of history. I understood that the function of memory is not only to register past events, but to stimulate human conscience. Soon contemporary examples of Genocide followed, such as the slaughter of the Armenians in 1915. It became clear to me that the diversity of nations, religious groups and races is essential to civilization because every one of these groups has a mission to fulfill and a contribution to make in terms of culture. . . I decided to become a lawyer and work for the outlawing of Genocide and for its prevention through the cooperation of nations." (p. 2)

(c) ". . . A bold plan was formulated in my mind. This consisted [of] obtaining the ratification by Turkey among the first twenty founding nations. This would be an atonement for [the] genocide of the Armenians. But how could this be achieved? . . . The Turks are proud of their republican form of government and of progressive concepts, which helped them in replacing the rule of the Ottoman Empire. The genocide convention must be put within the framework of social and international progress. I knew however that in this conversation both sides will have to avoid speaking about one thing, although it would be constantly in their minds: the Armenians." (p. 32)

(Sources: Congressional Research Service: The Raphael Lemkin Papers, N.Y. Public Library.)

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I can only reiterate what I have already said, and that is, No. 1, there have been no hearings. No. 2, there has been no scholarly, definitive conclusions that this would qualify as genocide. No. 3, there is not any question but that we are imposing a gross insult on the Turks, and if the proof were absolutely conclusive perhaps that would be acceptable.

No. 4, I will always have difficulty any time we accuse a nation of present day people who had nothing to do whatever with atrocities that were perpetrated by their forebears. Few of the people who live in Turkey today could possibly have been involved. They are the children and the grandchildren and the great-grandchildren of those who committed whatever atrocities they did on the Armenians.

Now, if you want to commemorate the suffering of the Armenians, count me in. They have suffered. There are many Armenians in the United States and they make great contributions. In my statements here, I know you probably can't tell what kind of a bent somebody is going to put on what a Senator says here. The press dictates that. But my intent is to say that the Armenians make great contributions to our security. When the Armenians earthquake hit in the Soviet Union, Protestant, Catholic, and, Jewish people pulled together, but the Armenian churches in this country were the first to take up money and clothing offerings for the relief of Armenia.

So this is in no way intended to denigrate the suffering that they went through or, for that matter, the contributions that they make to our country. There are big Armenian enclaves in a lot of our cities. It is just that I think the working is much to harsh, it is insulting, and it is based on a word that has never been conclusively determined to be applicable in this particular case.

Mr. President, it is one of those things in which I would not have been involved, frankly, if the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, our former majority leader, the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, had not called me and asked me to take a second look at the resolution and to study it and see if I would consider changing positions. I came to the conclusion that he is right in resisting it. If you want to change the language of this resolution—in my opinion you probably could not please Turkey by making much, if any, change in this resolution, but if you want to say the Armenians suffered untold misery, that is fine.

Bear in mind that the Armenians in this country whose parents and grandparents suffered still feel some of the pain, just as blacks in this country still feel the results of slavery; some of the hangover from those days is not gone. I have voted every time I had a chance to try to balance the scales and provide all the kind of help I could to redress the injustices that black people have suffered in the past, and I will continue to do so. But as I say, I think this resolution goes too far and therefore, Mr. President, I will vote against cloture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CONRAD). The Senator from West Virginia has the floor.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I understand that the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] wishes to address the Senate for 10 minutes. Did I so understand?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I shall yield to the distinguished Senator under the same terms and conditions as before. But before I yield and while the distinguished Senator from Arkansas is on the floor, I want to thank him for his statement, for the decision which he came to after carefully considering the resolution, and in the context of what he believes to be our country's security interests and in the context of what he believes to be the point that I have been trying to make, namely that this Senate is not the place to make this determination.

With respect to the Genocide Convention—there has been much said today about the Genocide Convention—I wonder how many Senators have read it lately. That is one thing I often wonder when I hear people talk about the Constitution, how recently have they read it.

The implementation of the Genocide Convention is something that I think should be injected right here because much has been said about Genocide Convention. It is true that Mr. DOLE was the leader of the Senate when the Senate approved the ratification of the Genocide Convention, and I was the leader of the Senate when the Senate passed the implementing legislation. It became public law November 4, Public Law 100-606.

Mr. President, the purpose of the international convention was to codify international law respecting the crime of genocide. The convention also in article 8 identified a mechanism for the contracting parties to bring the question of genocidal behavior as identified in the convention before various organs of the United Nations including directly to the Security Council, the General Assembly or other parts of the United Nations. Article 9 of the convention also provides that disputes between the contracting parties relating to the interpretation of the convention, including the question of responsibility of the state for gencoide "shall be submitted to the International Court of Justice at the request of any of the parties to the dispute."

I am not advocating action on the convention on this matter, but I am pointing out that resolutions of the type pending on the Senate floor could be used for political reasons or any reason to charge the state or a group with the crime of genocide.

Is genocide being perpetrated today in the Caucasus against the Armenians? Is genocide being perpetrated against Turks in Bulgaria today? It is a serious charge. That is why an international convention was negotiated. That is why the instrument has been created by the legislation that we passed and by the convention that was ratified.

That was the instrument. The Senate is not the instrument for determining what is genocide and what is not genocide and what nation shall be labeled with the crime of genocide. Resolutions of the type now on the floor circumvent the convention.

It is easy to hurl charges. And a good lawyer can hurl charges and any good lawyer can make a case of some kind that justice is being done. Any good lawyer can take any side on a question and argue it. Any good lawyer can draft up a resolution and find a Senator to introduce it. That is the easy part.

And I am not impugning anybody's motives for pointing out that injustices have been done to any group. I have agreed. Everyone who has spoken is in agreement that injustices were perpetrated on Armenians. But there have been injustices perpetrated on Turks. There have been injustices perpetrated, and as someone has already said here, practically every group has had an injustice done to it.

Someone has said that every man, if he goes far back enough, will find that he has in his ancestry a king. He will also find an ancestry with slaves. So if we go back far enough, we can find where many wrongs have been committed.

There is no question that injustices were done. There is no question but that the stories, the news stories from the New York Times which have been brought before the Senate today, reveal great injustices. That is beside the point.

The point being the Senate, after having voted to approve the ratification of the convention, after having passed the implementing language, is now going to set itself up as the instrument whereby these decisions will be made as to what constitutes genocide; what country or what group has committed the crime.

It is easy to see what kind of road we could travel down on the matter of finding a party guilty of genocide. Having finally made the Genocide Convention the law of the land after 40 years, it is ironic that we are now faced with a resolution which approaches the general issue in a way that ignores or circumvents the convention.

So, Mr. President, it is dangerous and inappropriate for the Senate to act as a tribunal except in the trial of impeachments—or to act as some rump juridical body on the matter of the crime of genocide.

There are other subtle ways in which the international community as a whole has decided to address the question.

Mr. President, I yield, and I am not yielding time. I am yielding the floor for a period of time. I just fell into this situation of getting the floor today, and being prepared to make a somewhat lengthy speech but seeing other Senators coming to the floor, I have not hesitated to yield to anyone who wanted to speak.

But I do want to complete my own speech. But at the same time, as I say, I am conscious of the desires of others.

I yield to the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] for not to exceed 10 minutes, with the understanding that I retain my right to the floor, that upon my resumption of the floor it not be counted as a second speech against me, and that the speech by the distinguished Senator from California not constitute an interruption in my speech as it appears in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered. The Senator from California is recognized.

The Senator from West Virginia retains the floor.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I thank the Chair. I thank my friend, the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, for his courtesy in relinquishing the floor for the purposes of allowing me to interject these remarks.

Mr. President, I listened with interest and respect to the remarks just made by my friend from Arkansas. I am not certain what document he has been looking at that has inspired in him the concern that we are going to give offense, that the language of the resolution is too harsh. The resolution that is before me is one that simply calls upon the President and the people of the United States to mark a day as a day of remembrance, commemorating what is the 75th anniversary of a tragedy that everyone seems to agree did in fact occur.

It was genocide, and there can be no lesser word for what occurred, slaughter of a million and a half people, innocent men, women, and children. It is language that simply calls upon us to observe with a day of remembrance that tragedy.

And the only offense it gives would be to those actually responsible for that genocide, those long dead, I might say, who were in fact part of a regime that existed prior to the establishment of the Republic of Turkey, and the language of this resolution makes that very clear.

It in no way reflects either upon the people of Turkey nor upon the Government, either the present or the prior Government of the Republic of Turkey, that which took effect under Kemal Ataturk, after 1923.

Rather, Mr. President, the focus of this resolution is upon the terrible deeds that were inflected upon a million and a half Armenians who by the accident of their birth were guilty of no crime other than being Armenian. It was inflicted by officials of the Ottoman Empire.

And indeed we need not consult even the dozens of reports that appeared with datelines from Petrograd, the Transcaucasian, from Athens, from Constantinople, from London, from Washington. We do not even have to go to the extensive documentations to be found in the U.S. archives.

If anyone is in any doubt, I ask them to consult the Ottoman regime itself, which admitted in documentation available to us the responsibility of Ottoman officials for planning and implementing that genocide.

In 1919, before the founding of the Republic of Turkey, the Ottoman Government that was in fact the successor to the regime, which was in power during the years of the Second World War which was generally identified as the Committee of Union and Progress—that successor Ottoman Empire actually placed the CUP Prime Minister, the War Minister, and the Marine Minister on trial and found each of them guilty of directing the deportation and massacre of the Armenian people. The indictment of those officials reads in part as follows:

> The truth is that Tallat (Prime Minister), Enver (War Minister), and Jemal (Marine Minister), ordered the massacres fully. * * * They led criminal bands who murdered people, pillaged properties, money and valuables, burned homes, incinerated the dead, violated the honor of women and perpetrated all kinds of crimes and abominations. Many of these persons were subjected to these cruelties without regard to race or religion, including all the children of the country. Armenians comprised an important part of those victimized. They were unlucky.

It seems to me that is something of an understatement.

I continue to quote the language of that indictment:

> The principal subject matter of this investigation has been the event of the disaster befalling the deported Armenians—an event which occurred at various times and places. Legal steps are now being taken against individuals responsible for that occurrence.

And:

> The disaster visiting the Armenians was not a local or isolated event. It was the result of a premeditated decision taken by a central body composed of the above-mentioned persons; and the immolations and excesses which took place were based on oral and written orders issued by that central body.

Mr. President, that, it seems to me, should put to rest any concern as to whether or not the event occurred or as to who was responsible for it. In the judgment of that successor Ottoman regime, it was the named officials. I suspect that the named officials were indeed guilty, but that they were not alone.

But the point is, very clearly, neither the language nor the history of this tragic incident in any way indicts present-day Turks or the Government of the Republic of Turkey.

The second point that has troubled many on this floor is that the passage of this resolution would endanger our security relationship, one that we deeply and rightly value, with the Republic of Turkey.

Let me point out that Members of both the House and the Senate have introduced this measure annually since 1984 and as precisely, since that year, the Congress and the administration have approved repeatedly extensive military aid packages for Turkey, as indeed we should. Foreign military sales and military assistance program appropriations totaling $715 million were granted in fiscal year 1984; $700 million in 1985; $615 million in 1986; $490 million in fiscal year 1987 and 1988, that is, in each of those years; $500 million each in fiscal 1989 and 1990. The request for fiscal year 1991 is for $545 million. Among the other initiatives, these appropriations have enabled Turkey to undertake critical M-48 tank and naval frigate modernization programs.

On November 14, 1986, the southern region amendment to the Department of Defense authorization bill for fiscal year 1987 became the law. This legislation allows the President to transfer excess defense articles at no cost to NATO, southern flank nations. In the 4 short years that have ensued, this amendment has permitted Turkey to obtain from the United States Government 40 F-4E fighter aircraft, 370 recoil rifles, 74 M-114 howitzers, and 16 leased ships. In December 1983, the Reagan administration concluded a letter of offer and assistance to Turkey for coproduction of 160 F-16 jet fighters.

Mr. President, over its entire life this arrangement will consume U.S. foreign military sale credits worth $3.2 billion. These commitments in total have made Turkey the third largest recipient of United States military assistance in the world.

Mr. President, that is a very good thing. It benefits the United States and all the rest of our NATO allies, as well as the people of the Republic of Turkey. No one by this resolution, or by any other work or deed, is suggesting that we should depart from our prior course of conduct in providing this kind of military assistance to a valued, trusted military ally—very much to the contrary—any more than that we are visiting the sins of the fathers upon the sons in the case of West or, for that matter now, East Germany, as it relates to another terrible tragedy, another act of genocide that propelled the world, though too late, because of the years of indifference that permitted it to occur, and that, of course, was the Holocaust which we have commemorated many times upon this floor and in fact have certified a national commission for the purpose of commemorating genocide—specifically, the Holocaust Commission.

It is for that purpose, Mr. President, that my friend, the Republican leader, and the extensive coauthors who have joined as cosponsors of this resolution are asking nothing more than the simple justice that we spend a brief amount of time and set aside a day marking this terrible tragedy, as indeed we should, with the view not only to observing the past suffering, but preventing any possible recurrence with any people ever again in the future.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired under the agreement with the Senator who holds the floor.

Mr. WILSON. I wonder if I might ask to have a single minute more.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield the floor for an additional 3 minutes under the same terms and conditions by which I have yielded heretofore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is granted an additional 3 minutes.

Mr. WILSON. I thank the Chair and I thank my friend from West Virginia for the generosity of his yielding the additional time. I will not require it all.

I simply want to make clear that the language of this resolution, which has been the subject of concern expressed by my friend from Arkansas, is language which is very careful, simply to ask that a day of remembrance be set aside to mark this tragedy, and the only identification as to responsibility is to state that the Ottoman regimes in power at the time of the First World War were, in fact, the ones responsible for bringing about the deportation and massacre, to quote the language of the Ottoman indictment of Ottoman officials. It is nothing more than that. It does not reflect upon the people of modern day Turkey, as has been claimed on this floor. That is simply inaccurate. I do not think that anyone wishes to do that, because to do that would be unfair and unjust, as much as it would be unjust to turn a blind eye and pretend that this never occurred or that no one was responsible for it.

Let us do, very simply, what the language enjoins us to do. It is little enough. If we do not do that, I submit that once again, it will be an instance of the kind that Edmund Burke warned us against when in the House of Commons he said, "All that is necessary for the triumph of evil is for enough good men to do nothing."

Mr. President, I thank the Chair, and I thank my friend from West Virginia and yield the floor back to him.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR], wishes to address the Senate on the subject for a period of 5 minutes. I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to Mr. PRYOR for 5 minutes without losing my right to the floor, without being charged with a second speech, or without his speech interrupting my speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for yielding to me. In fact,

I may be able to do this with fewer than the 5 minutes allocated.

Mr. President, I think that one thing should be very clear in this debate, that there are not two views today in the U.S. Senate on genocide. I supported, in 1988 the Senate finally approved, the genocide convention. Yes, Mr. President, there is one view on genocide, which condemns it and holds it in contempt. There are, however, two heartfelt views held by the Members of this body on the practical effects of Senate Joint Resolution 212, the Armenian resolution, which is now before the U.S. Senate.

There are two divergent views on whether the Senate should take a legislative action that some believe will interpret an historical topic which is today the subject of scholarly debate.

First, I wish to address the practical implications of passing this resolution. This document appears to be short. It appears to be simple. It seems to simply commemorate the Armenian lives lost under the rule of the Ottoman government after 1915. Practically speaking, however, this simple act could well become, and probably will be, a bombshell on the Turkish political scene. We cannot begin to know what potential and emotional and political impact this resolution would have halfway around the world.

Mr. President, the proponents of this measure, whose good intentions no one can question, have conceded that their resolution will generate a very strong reaction in Turkey. Government officials and political leaders in Turkey have made it very clear that passage of Senate Joint Resolution 212 will be offensive and adversely affect the current good relations between the United States of America and Turkey. Turkey has been a trusted and a loyal NATO ally.

The political fallout will not stop at official levels in Turkey. News of the passage of this resolution will be run on the front page of every Turkish newspaper, played on every Turkish news program. Our well-intentioned resolution is likely to have serious unintentional political repercussions which will resound from the President of Turkey down to the average person in the street.

Mr. President, this leads me to a second point on the practical implications of this resolution—its emotional impact. The resolution today seems so innocuous but it opens up a Pandora's box of volatile ethnic iussues that go back centuries. Very real manifestations of those ethnic issues are found today in the instability and ethnic conflict of the southern republics of the Soviet Union.

I fear, and many experts actually predict, that passage of this resolution will fan the flames of ethnic unrest and violence throughout the region. In our effort to take a stand on human rights we may be engendering ethnic strife and human suffering.

Mr. President, I fully sympathize with the Armenians whose ancestors' lives were lost in conflicts under the Ottomon government, but I wonder if this resolution is the appropriate way at this time to recognize the dead.

Certainly the events in Turkey after World War I are a matter of great historical significance and a matter of understandable concern of the descendants of the Armenians of that era. However, the details of those events are a matter of continuing debate among distinguished historians and scholars.

Mr. President, this may seem a little academic but it is quite important to this resolution which puts the U.S. Senate, a political body, on record as supporting the definition of an Armenian tragedy as a genocide, which is a historical judgment at best.

I wonder whether we want to put the U.S. Senate in the position of making such a determination in light of the disagreement among so many respected scholars today.

Mr. President, I commend the supporters of this resolution. They seek to honor a proud people. They want to remember a tragic point in history and, Mr. President, I truly believe each of the supporter's values and wants to maintain our close ties with our ally Turkey.

These are commendable goals. They are commendable beliefs. Unfortunately the unintended and negative effects of this resolution outweigh the intended result. Accordingly, Mr. President, I am unable to support this resolution.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time and once again I thank the very distinguished Senator from West Virginia for yielding this amount of time to me.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Arkansas for his excellent statement. It was brief. He said it would be brief, it was to the point. It was incisive, and I compliment him.

I also wish to thank Senator EXON from Nebraska, who earlier made a statement in opposition to the resolution and likewise his was an excellent statement.

Senator EXON is a member of the Armed Services Committee and I think that his insight into the resolution, the kind of mischief that it could cause unintentionally, on the part of any cosponsors or authors of the resolution or Senators who vote for it, would be regrettable.

Mr. President, to return to the main thread of my comments—and I will have more to say about Turkish history and Europe as we go along—the Turkish willingness and ability to absorb the influences of Europe and to life, East meets West, was a great asset for Ataturk. Among the many great tasks that faced the new Republic of Turkey was a matter of developing an economic system.

With the great hinterlands of Eastern Europe having become independent states and the Arab provinces having become French League of Nations mandates or colonies, it was necessary to build a new economy in Turkey.

Mr. President, I see that my good friend, Senator BOREN, is on the floor. He is the chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee. He has had great experience and lengthy service on that committee and as chairman of the committee.

I recall the visit to the NATO capitals back when I was the majority leader when we were considering a proposal of the ratification of the INF Treaty. During that visit, Senator BOREN, Senator NUNN, Senator PELL, and I talked with high government officials about the proposed treaty, about its impact on NATO and among those NATO capitals was that of Ankara. And we visited with then-President Evren and the then-Prime Minister, Mr. Ozal. And, as always, we came away with great impressions of our Turkish friends and assurances that they were our friends, assurances that they were supporters of the treaty, if they could indeed be sure that the treaty in all of its provisions were in the best interest of NATO, and the United States. And the Prime Minister then is the President of Turkey today, Mr. Ozal.

So, I want to yield to my friend, Mr. BOREN, because he sees through eyes that are somewhat different, from his vantage point on the Intelligence Committee, and I am eager to hear what he has to say. I know the Senate will profit by what he has to say about the resolution, about Turkey, about the possible impact of the resolution.

And may I say that it was only after the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN] were fully satisfied as to that INF treaty, were fully assured that the bugs were worked out—and there were some bugs in it, that was evident by the fact that our Secretary of State went back to Moscow and with Mr. Shevardnadze worked out some of the problems to the complete satisfaction of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN] and the Armed Services Committee—and after the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN] was fully satisfied that the White House had given him the kind of assurances that he felt were needed before the Senate gave its approval to the ratification of that treaty, it was after those two Senators were assured through their lengthy hearings, that I finally, as majority leader, said we will call up the treaty.

So that indicated the kind of faith I had in the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from Georgia as the chairmen of those two important committees, when I indicated that until they are satisfied and their committees are satisfied, I am not going to bring up that treaty.

There was a lot of pressure on me from the White House and the other side of the aisle and on my own side of the aisle at that time, but not until I was satisfied that those two chairmen and their ranking members were able to assure the Senate that the "i's" had been dotted and the "t's" crossed, was the treaty brought up.

So it is with that kind of faith that I had then, that I have today, that I am happy to express on the floor, and I will listen to what he has to say. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN] for such time as he may consume, with the understanding that I not give up my rights to the floor, that my resumption of my speech afterward will not constitute a second speech, and that no interruption will be shown in my speech as it appears in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from Oklahoma is recognized under the terms and conditions outlined by the Senator from West Virginia who retains the right to the floor.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I thank the Chair and I thank my distinguished colleague from West Virginia, for whom I have so much respect, for the kind and generous remarks that he has just made. He has been a great leader of the Senate. He serves as our President pro tempore today and has a tremendous perspective about the proper role of this institution in our form of government.

One of the most educational experiences of my life was this mission that we had that the Senator from West Virginia just referred to, to NATO capitals, when we were discussing the INF Treaty.

We had the opportunity to meet with the leaders of all of those countries involved. We met with both the then Prime Minister, President now, Ozal of Turkey, and President Evren. We met with leaders, including President Mitterrand of France, the leader of Italy, Mr. Kohl and others of his associates of West Germany, and also with Mrs. Thatcher and the leaders of British Government. We had an opportunity to gain a real perspective about what was going on in the world about superpower relationships, about regional security interests.

One of the things that I learned from that trip, and I learned it with renewed understanding and deeper understanding than I had even before I made that trip, was the close relationship between the United States and the Government of Turkey, especially close relationship between the current leadership of the Government of Turkey and the great friendship which they were demonstrating for the United States.

I had not known a good bit about our relationships before I went. I had known about important business in which the Turkish Government was acting in partnership with the United States, with our regional security interests, our economic interests, and indeed to try to maintain peace and stability in an area of the world which has been so troubled, an area that has been swept by religious and ethnic disturbances for many, many years and is certainly, of all of the areas of the world today, perhaps the area which runs the gravest risk of some sort of cataclysm because of the long-festering traditional animosities that have existed between groups and religious groups in that particular part of the world.

The current Government of Turkey and the present leadership of the Government of Turkey are an important force for good in that area of the world for trying to create understanding, for building bridges of understanding between the United States and those nations of the Middle East and the Balkan areas who have oftentimes been in an adversarial role with each other.

The Turkish Government has been able to move in a way that has reached out to all sides of conflicts and controversies of the Middle East. They have been very helpful to us and a friend in interpreting our interests, our motives, our desire to promote peace and stability in the region to others because they have credibility with neighboring countries and they were able to speak for us in our behalf in a way of great assistance to the United States.

There are few countries located any place on the globe that provide such an important level of cooperation and friendship and mutual help in terms of national security matters as do the leaders of the Turkish Government and the Turkish people today provide for the people and leaders of the United States.

So it is in that context that I think we have to think very carefully about what we are doing here. It would be real easy for Members of the Senate to simply say I have great sympathy for the fact that people have suffered, that wrong has been done to people in the past, and to express concern for that suffering. Because I do not think there is a single Member of the U.S. Senate in either party, certainly not the Senator from West Virginia, not other Senators that have spoken expressing concerns about proceeding with this resolution, not a single Senator that does not have a very deep feeling of sorrow and pain for what has happened to the Armenian people over many, many years, for the terrible loss of life that occurred in the later part of the second decade of this century and the first part of the third decade of this century; terrible things that happened and things that remain in our consciousness, the consciousness of all of us.

Every Member of this Senate feels sympathy for those who suffered and for their families, and of course, those who died. In recent years Armenians especially in the Soviet Union have suffered a great deal from the tragic earthquake that decimated a large area of the Soviet Republic of Armenia and from recent ethnic clashes in Azerbaijan. All of us are sympathetic to the plight of Armenians in the Soviet Union in their drive for political freedom.

In our own country, the Armenian community has deep roots. Those of Armenian descent have made a great contribution to the political, social, and religious life of this country. They are good citizens. They are an important part of this rich fabric of tapestry of different races and religions that have come together and formed the real strength and quality of this country. We honor the contributions that they have made.

We understand fully the deep feelings that they have about their ancestors and family members in earlier years and earlier decades who suffered, who died, who suffered so much in the kinds of armed conflicts that occur at a time not unlike the time in which we are living now when the old order of world affairs was passing away and a new order was being created. There was a great deal of chaos in the world in the years 1915, 1916, 1917, and the years leading up to the First World War and the aftermath of the First World War, continued chaos, continued lack of definition of relationships, a lot of ethnic discord, discord between those of different races and different religions. Not unlike the times that we are going through right now.

In fact, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point two articles, one recently appearing in the Washington Post by Charles Krauthammer and another appearing in the New York Times by Alan Cowell which really catalog the kind of chaos that is going on in that particular region of the world at this time that we are living through right now, the time of political unrest, upheaval and rapid change, the kind of ethnic violence that is going on at this moment.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NEW CRESCENT OF CRISIS: GLOBAL INTIFADA

(By Charles Krauthammer)

Pick up the newspaper, and look at the map. Where are the great explosions of ethnic and religious violence? Follow an arc from east to west then south: Kashmir, Azerbaijan, Kosovo (Yugoslavia), Lebanon, the West Bank. Along this new "arc of crisis" some of the most violent, volatile conflicts in the world are being played out. The explosions appear random. But a deep historical current runs through them all.

All of these conflicts are rooted in the same grievance: a Moslem population is demanding sovereign control over a piece of territory in which it constitutes a local majority. The Moslems are fighting for (1) dominion over their province and (2) domination over the local non-Moslem minorities. In all but Lebanon (which long ago achieved sovereignty), they demand (3) separation from the non-Moslem country to which they are now joined and (4) independence or unification with the Moslem heartland.

The obvious world-historical event of the day is the collapse of Soviet power. But there is another great movement going on as well, unnoticed but just as portentous: a global intifada. Consider:

Kashmir is the northern province of predominantly Hindu India, the only one with a Moslem majority. Its Moslems are in rebellion—"People of all ages," reports the local New York Times correspondent, "talk of jihads and intifadas, holy wars and uprisings"—demanding independence or unification with Moslem Pakistan. Indian forces sent to restore order have killed 133 Kashmiris since the newest flare up of this intifada began last month.

In Azerbaijan, the Soviet army was sent to crush a popular movement for secession and independence by Moslem Azerbaijanis.

In Kosovo province, Yugoslavia, the Albanian Moslem majority is demanding freedom from control by non-Albanian, non-Moslem Serbia.

In Lebanon, the Moslem majority backed powerfully by Syria surrounds and would subdue the now fratricidal Christian minority.

On the West Bank and Gaza, the local Palestinian majority and a strong Islamic movement are demanding their own separate Arab state (some say detached from, some say in place of Israel).

These are all long-standing conflicts. They are, of course, not centrally directed. They have their own origins and each its claim to justice. But they share not just a common political thread—the Muslim demand for hegemony—but a geographical unity. Look at the map. The Islamic heartland stretches contiguously from Morocco to Pakistan. These conflicts are all taking place at the edges of that heartland, precisely where the Moslem world meets the surrounding non-Moslems.

Kashmir is where the Moslem heartland meets Hindu India. Azerbaijan marks the border of Islam with the southern flank of the Soviet Union at the Caucasus, Kosovo (together with Bosnia, for now quiet) marks the farthest reach of Moslem populations into Christian Europe. In Lebanon and Israel, Islam confronts non-Moslem communities, one Christian, one Jewish, clinging to the edge of the Islamic world at the Mediterranean.

The Islamic heartland has gone through its period of decolonization. From Morocco to Pakistan these countries threw off European imperialism in a process that began earlier in the century and may be said to have culminated with the revolution in Iran. What we are seeing now is the further evolution of the Islamic awakening: the demand for local hegemony by Moslem populations at the borders of the Islamic heartland.

This demand is not without irony. In insisting upon self-determination, the activists demand what the Islamic world refuses to grant any of its ethnic and religious subgroups; neither its Kurds nor its Armenians nor its blacks (in southern Sudan, for example) are permitted sovereignty and territorial control over those lands in which they constitute a local majority.

Self-determination for whom? The Kashmiris are a minority within India. Kosovo Albanians are a minority within Yugoslavia. They demand political control of the subunit, Kashmir and Kosovo, where they constitute the local majority. But why does self-determination stop there? Will they grant similar autonomy, let alone independence, to the smaller groups within these territories? The Hindus of Kashmir and the Serbs and Montenegrins of Kosovo are hardly likely to enjoy very many civil rights, let alone national rights, under the rule of the separatists. (A reality that in the last decade has induced one-fifth of the non-Albanian population of Kosovo to flee.)

There is something arbitrary and nonreciprocal about these demands for independence. Nagorno-Karabakh is an overwhelmingly (Christian) Armenian province within Azerbaijan. It is demanding from Azerbaijan what Azerbaijan is demanding from the Soviet Union: freedom. Azerbaijan not only rejects that demand. It is prepared to go to war with Armenia to back that rejection.

What is being pursued, therefore, is not Wilsonian self-determination (though many of these intifadas have adopted its language), because in the Islamic world self-determination is permitted only to Moslems. What instead is being pursued is a pan-Islamic demand for sovereignty over any territory where Moslems form a local majority.

What does this mean? It is obvious that the turmoil in Eastern Europe, the Balkans and the Caucasus results form the collapse of communism. But history is being driven by another force as well: the political reawakening of the Islamic world. That reawakening is usually identified solely with fundamentalist, Koran-waving, Khomeiniism. Not so. Khomeini's success may be in inspiration, but these movements (with the possible exceptions of Kashmir and Gaza) are driven not so much by religious fervor as by a sense of ethnic and national separateness that may derive from Islamic identity but is not entirely defined by it.

Our focusing on Iran as the engine of Islamic revolution is a mistake. There is a much wider and deeper movement for Moslem political independence and political dominion. Compared to Iran, it is more secular and more Western but still far from democratic, and consequently, as the Armenians of Azerbaijan will testify, still far from tolerant. Its power now shaking the borders of the Islamic world, is just beginning to be felt.

On Sunday, Soviet Tadzhikistan exploded. Anti-Armenian, anti-Russian, anti-government rioting by the Moslem Tadzhiks signals that the last major region of the Islamic periphery, Soviet Central Asia, is next. The arc of crisis grows.

TURKEY: CRACKDOWN IS CAUSING TURKS TO BE TORN BY ANGER AND DESIRE TO KEEP TIES

(By Alan Cowell)

ANKARA, TURKEY, January 23.—As Turkish officials contemplate the Soviet crackdown in Azerbaijan, they are torn between anger at what they call repression of ethnic kinfolk and a desire to avoid greater bloodshed or strains with the Soviet Union.

Diplomats and officials say the authorities here have been upset by United States and other Western support of the Soviet intervention in Azerbaijan, saying the responses show double standards—or no standards at all—and reflect what one official called "political and religious bias" against Muslims. The Soviet action has thus driven a wedge between Washington and a close ally.

Turkey, the easternmost member of the Western alliance, shares a 390-mile frontier with the Soviet Union, only eight miles of it bordering directly on areas populated by Azerbaijanis in the enclave of Nakhicbevan.

But many Turks have a deep affinity with the Azeris, with whom they share a common language and a common heritage as descendants of the Turkic tribes that originated in Central Asia.

A CAUTIOUS DIPLOMACY

While most Azeris belong to the minority Shiite sect of Islam and most Turks are Sunnis, the distinctions seem to have been reduced in the shock of the Soviet intervention to crush Azerbaijani separatists and stem conflict between Azerbaijanis and the mostly Christian Armenians in the southern Soviet Union.

"You feel a bit broken when you see people on the television lying on the street, shot dead," said one official, speaking in return for anonymity. "This shouldn't be the way to handle the situation."

Turkish diplomacy is by tradition cautious, and the authorities here have maintained that style by characterizing the violence in Azerbaijan as an internal Soviet affair. But, officials said Ankara has intimated privately to the Soviet Union that is unhappy with the ferocity of the Soviet action.

"We have said we consider this problem as an internal problem of the Soviet Union," a high official said. "We have taken the utmost care not to give any incentive for unreasonable approaches to the problem," the official said, referring to Ankara's refusal to take public positions that might embolden Azerbaijanis to greater resistance at the risk of greater bloodshed. Turkey has withheld any public commitment to the Soviet Azerbaijanis' cause.

"PREFERRED IT MORE SUAVE"

But, the official said, "we have let the Soviets know our feelings" that "the Soviet way of handling the situation does not have our full support."

"We would have preferred that it be more suave," he said.

Turkey has long occupied an ambivalent position in this region, bridging Europe and Asia and the Arab world, yet fully at ease in none of lands once dominated for centuries by Ottoman forebears.

The crisis between Armenians and Azerbaijanis in the southern Soviet republics has an added twist here because Turkey has long faced accusations that Ottoman forces committed genocide against Armenians during the First World War in one of the many historical bouts of war between Turks and Russians. Turkish support for Azerbaijanis, thus, is cast by some Western commentators as a renewal of hostility toward Armenians.

HISTORICAL COMPLEXITIES

And, as the crisis in Azerbaijan has shown, an emotional pull toward kinfolk in the East reflects one of the most profound strains in modern Turkey, pitting the long-standing urge for acceptance in the West as a secular nation against roots that some Westerners argue lie in the Islamic East

The historical complexities have left Ankara facing equally complex quandaries.

"They don't want to be regarded in the West as the prototype of the Asiatic Turk, and they think that the way fighting in Azerbaijan is being reported reinforces the barbaric stereotype," a Western diplomat said. "That does not help their efforts to join the European Community."

As the crisis has unfolded, Turkish officials have been increasingly angered by what they consider biased assessments in the West of how the conflict began.

DOUBLE STANDARDS SEEN

"The feeling here is that any time the West can find a way to poke a Muslim in the eye, they'll do it," a Western diplomat said. "There's a sense that, as NATO is less important, and Eastern Europe gets more attention and Turkey becomes more marginal to Western security interests the West will try to push the Turks away. That was a widespread fear before what happened in Azerbaijan. And it's become much sharper since then."

The reason, a senior Turkish diplomat said, is that "there are double standards in the West."

"In this particular instance there were no standards at all," he said, because Washington and others endorsed the Soviet push on Azerbaijan, calculating that the action would not bring a public outcry in the West.

"There is a political and religious bias that makes it easier to support an invasion of Azerbaijan" than of other Soviet republics closer to the West where Christianity dominates, one official said.

Throughout the crisis, Turkish and Soviet officials have maintained close contact and, according to some officials, Ankara was appraised of Soviet intentions long before the military drive in Azerbaijan took place.

The dialogue reflects a mutual interest, diplomats said Azerbaijanis have appealed to both Turkey and Iran for support. But the Soviet Union is seeking to contain the crisis and has major economic ties with both. Neither wants the conflict to spill onto the their own territory. Additionally, a historical legacy of Turk-Russian war has left Ankara reluctant to risk Soviet hostility.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, we do then understand and sympathize with and have very deep feeling about those that have suffered in the past, about the lives that have been lost during this particular time. But we have to realize also that the Armenian resolution is something very different than a mere expression of our sorrow for what happened, a mere expression of sorrow for loss of life.

The Senate, which ratified the Genocide Convention during the 99th Congress and the implementing legislation only last session, has a very special responsibility when debating about any legislative expression that implicates any group with what would be called the practice of genocide. We have a very special responsibility to weigh all of the evidence with complete understanding of what has been done. Research and understanding of history is for historians and for scholars not for elected officials and politicians who are amateurs in this thick area of scholarly research.

The demise of the Ottoman Empire at the close of World War I led to a great deal of civil strife, as I have mentioned, in clashes throughout the region. And there is no question, no question in anyone's mind that many, many Armenians died during the period in question. It is also without question that members of other ethnic groups including Turks and others were also injured and killed during this particular period.

The crucial question posed by this resolution is its use of the term "genocide" which implies systematic and intentional mass extermination; a decision made by policymakers to carry out mass extermination as a matter of a very carefully contrived plan to wipe out a group of people. As lawmakers, all of us in the Senate, of course, understand the importance of having a full legal understanding of what is meant by the term "genocide" and what is meant by the intent and the level of the intent and deliberate organization and planning required before someone should be charged or some group of people should be charged with committing the practice of genocide.

I would simply say, Mr. President, that this is a matter that is just now really being opened for research in the kind of thorough way that should be done before any judgment is made on the question of using the term "genocide." Recently the Republic of Turkey, with urging from around the world, and also a strong feeling of wanting to have history accurately reported, opened the Ottoman archives of this particular period of time.

They are now being studied. Scholars from around the world are conducting the kind of careful research that is necessary to make a final judgment about whether or not the term "genocide" should accurately be applied to this tragic period of human suffering and loss of life in that region of the world.

For the first time, the deliberations of the Council of Ministers in that period are open for study, as are the records of non-Moslem people living in the region, through the so-called church registers.

American scholars, as I mentioned and those from other areas of the world, now have an opportunity to study and develop a full account of this period.

I think it is appropriate for those of us in Congress to encourage that scholarly research. Let us learn all we can about that period. Let us learn all we can about the human tragedy so we can learn from it, so we can dedicate ourselves to promoting understandings between people and sensitivity between people and tolerance between different groups and respect for all groups, without regard to ethnic background, to race, to religion, and to other factors. Because, after all, that is the kind of world that we are all committed to build.

So, Mr. President, while all of us have deep sympathy for those who suffered during this terrible period of the history of our world in a region that has been so troubled and where so many were so suffering during this period of time, I think we have to act with great care before we use the term "genocide" in any kind of legislative expression. And, above all, we should give the scholars who now for the first time have the opportunity to research the issue in question with all available documentation that will help them make some final decisions about it, give the scholars an opportunity to conduct this research before we, in the political process, rush to a judgment about a consensus that has not yet developed in the scholarly community.

We have to ask ourselves when we undertake any kind of expression of opinion in this Chamber, is this an expression of opinion that will help bring stability to the world? Is this an expression of opinion that will further the national interests of the United States? Is this an expression of opinion that will cause people to understand each other, to work together in the world, Is this an expression of opinion, as we are focusing on the issue of genocide, that will help bring a level of human understanding to all people that will help us prevent these kinds of actions from ever occurring again?

By taking these actions we should ask ourselves, will we create a worse situation in the world, and particularly in this region where only in the last few months we have had ethnic unrest and violence and tragic occurrences?

Or will our taking this action today have a constructive effect? Will it help save lives in the future? Will it help preserve the cultural and religious integrity of groups of people in the future? Mr. President, I sincerely doubt it.

I think, by taking this action, especially while scholars are still researching the issue, and by making this kind of condemnation of a country and friend that is playing a very constructive role in the world, not only in terms of friendship with the United States but also in trying to reach out to bring peace and stability to the whole region, we will be doing just the opposite.

It is sometimes easy to take a political action, especially when a position we might take may be misunderstood. I suppose it is easier for all of us, because of the interests of the Armenian community, especially in the United States, and the fact that so many are active in a laudatory way, commendable way in community affairs, and because some of them might not understand if we did not pass this resolution or if we said this resolution really should not be appropriately considered at this time, the easier course might be simply to say let us move ahead and pass it. We do not have to explain ourselves, then, to the Armenian community in the United States.

I know there are many of our colleagues who feel very sincerely that we should do just that. I do not question the sincerity or the motivation of the Senator from Kansas for introducing this joint resolution. I know deep in his heart he has very strong feelings about what happened. I know he has a very strong desire to work for a world in which this kind of tragedy will never occur again.

But, Mr. President, there are times when we are called to go beyond just taking positions that people will readily understand. There are times in this institution in which we have to go beyond what the public opinion polls might say. There are times in which we are called to lead.

One of the reasons why I am such an admirer of the Senator from West Virginia is that time and time again, from the days that I first came here as a junior Member of this body, I have seen the Senator from West Virginia not just try to follow the polls, not just take the easy road because it would be simpler to explain; I have seen him willing to take the other road, the road perhaps less traveled: The road of real statesmanship, the road of doing what is right, even if it is not immediately understood by everyone who might be watching his actions, the road which says, I am going to keep an eye on the history book. I am going to think about what is best in the long run, not what temporarily might be the best thing to do politically.

I admire him greatly for taking that stance now because, while, as I say, it might be easier to explain if we voted for this resolution and pushed it to passage because we can explain it very easily and say we were expressing our lament about a tragedy in history, a loss of life, action against a group of people and their cultural integrity—that would be easy to explain, but, Mr. President, it would not be right. Because it would not be fair to rush to judgment before the record has been completely examined. At the same time, we have to think about the result of our actions. That is the test.

Mr. President, I again assert that it will simply cause damage to peace and stability in this troubled region of the world. It will not help bring peace and stability. I had the opportunity to visit recently with the Ambassador of the United States to Turkey, Mr. Abramowitz, about this situation, last year.

He indicated to me that, even with all that was occurring around the world over the last year in Europe, that the people of Turkey, in terms of their focus and their understanding of this issue and how it would be received by them if we passed this resolution, have made it their number one foreign policy concern. Because they take it as an indictment of themselves, the current leadership of the country, as well as a comment about their ancestors, about those who have come before them.

Ambassador Abramowitz I hope will have a chance to meet with all Senators about this issue. He indicated to me he would not be able to accomplish anything as our Ambassador if this resolution is passed. His ability to deal with this important ally and to gain their cooperation on important matters, matters that will be helpful to all of the people of this region of the world, whether they are Turkish, whether they are Armenian, whether they are Christian or Moslem or Jewish or members of other religious faiths, it will do nothing to help. It will undermine his ability to gain cooperation and to build a partnership for the kinds of actions that are so important in that region of the world, for the economic development that is necessary to raise the living standards and improve the quality of life for all of the people in this area.

Turkey has been an important economic partner as well as an important political and military partner, an important Member of NATO. The current leader of the Turkish Republic is a brilliant man, an economist, formerly with the World Bank, a man who understands what is necessary for the economic development, not only of his whole country but the economic development for all the people in the region, not just people of Turkish descent.

So, Mr. President, I think we have to weigh very carefully the warning from Ambassador Abramowitz that this resolution, if we pass it, will not promote our interests. It will not promote a close friendship and cooperation with the people of Turkey. It will not help anyone in the region in terms of building toward peace and stability and economic development.

The White House, the State Department, and the Defense Department all have voiced their strong opposition to this resolution. I again emphasize, from my own perspective as chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, we have an important partnership with Turkey on a whole range of matters—political, diplomatic, military and economic—that are of great importance and great strategic interest to the United States of America.

So, Mr. President, while I certainly feel deeply about what happened in the past, while I am concerned about the loss of life, while I deplore it, while I feel great sorrow for those, on all sides and from all groups who lost their lives in this period of time, and have particular feeling for the Armenian people because of the sufferings that they have gone through for many decades, and while I know the vast majority of the American peole feel that same sympathy, and that while I am convinced every single Senator, whether they vote for or against this resolution feels the same, I am constrained to say that our higher obligation is to stop and say: Let us act not on the basis of what will be instantly and immediately understood by our constituents, but let us have the courage to lead, to inform and to act in what is really the best interests of all the people, not only of our country but all people in the region.

If, indeed, this resolution, is passed, would be a source of bitterness in the future, if it would bring ill will, if it would inflict pain, if it would cause itself misunderstanding, if it would rupture an important friendship between this country and a close ally, if it would make it more difficult for us to form a partnership to help all the people of this region, then, Mr. President, it is wrong for us to pass it.

It is not the right time to consider it. When in doubt, the U.S. Senate should not act on a matter of this importance, particularly of this importance, to a friend of the United States.

I have heard from a number of Americans who conduct business in Turkey. I have heard from the Turkish-United States Business Council about this resolution and the Aerospace Industries Association expressing their opinion about this joint resolution, urging us to postpone consideration of it, not to pass it in its current form.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Record a letter from Howard Wahl, chairman of the Turkish-United States Business Council, and also a letter from Mr. Don Fuqua, United States Aerospace Industries Association at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TURKISH-U.S. BUSINESS COUNCIL,
Washington, DC, February 14, 1990.

Hon. DAVID L. BOREN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR BOREN: I write to you on behalf of the more than forty U.S. corporations which support this Council to urge that you carefully weigh the following factors in considering your vote on SJR 212 (the Armenian Genocide Resolution):

There is the widespread perception in Turkey from the President to the man on the street that this is not a simple commemorative resolution, but a punitive measure designed to slander a people with callous disregard for 45 years of their unconditional support for American global objectives.

The Government of Turkey would view U.S. Senate approval of SJR 212 as a clear-cut violation of the Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement which the U.S. recently negotiated with Turkey, and could be expected to review its obligations under that pact accordingly.

There is a strong consensus among the American corporate community that passage of this resolution would do untold, long-term harm to our commercial relationships with Turkey, a country with whom we have a positive trade balance and one which offers great promise as a trading and joint venture partner with U.S. firms.

Turkey's critical role in Western security will increase in the years ahead. As the U.S. reduces its foreign military presence, Turkey will be called upon to assume a larger proportion of continuing common regional defense burdens.

The historical premise of SJR 212 is questionable; its consequences are not. It would clearly undermine both U.S. commercial and geo-political interests.

We urge you to weigh these considerations in your deliberations on SJR 212, which is to be voted in the Senate in the very near future, and to oppose this resolution or any variations of it.

Sincerely,

HOWARD W. WAHL,
Chairman.

AEROSPACE INDUSTRIES ASSOCIATION,
Washington, DC, February 16, 1990.

Hon. DAVID L. BOREN,
U.S. Senate, 453 Russell Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR BOREN: I understand there is some likelihood that the Senate will take up S.J. Res. 212, the "Armenian Genocide Resolution", in the next few weeks. I hope that it will not do so.

The Aerospace Industry Association represents most of the major companies that produce aircraft, engines, missiles, and space craft (see attached membership list). Last year our industry exported $31 billion in U.S. products, and had a positive trade balance of $21 billion, a better record than any other U.S. economic sector. We are obviously concerned about an action which could undercut the ability of our members to continue that record.

AIA does not purport to be an expert on history. But we do note that each of the past Administrations has opposed this type of resolution. This Administration is no exception. The White House has stated that, as currently drafted, it would "vigorously oppose" S.J. Res. 212.

Turkey has long been a major customer for U.S. commercial and defense aerospace products. Its concern with the resolution has led to the suspension of several contract negotiations with U.S. firms involving hundreds of millions of dollars. As the products we sell tend to remain in inventory for two decades, a decision to turn to another supplier today will affect U.S. business and jobs for years to come.

By word and by deed, no country has in recent years taken a stronger stance than the United States when it comes to expressing condemnation for any violations of human rights in today's world, let alone for such a grievous crime as genocide. We need hardly turn to a tragic but disputed episode of seventy years ago to clarify U.S. attitudes on such matters.

I would therefore hope that the Senate would defeat the resolution if it is considered. It is more important that we address the critical problems currently confronting that troubled region of the world, than it is to inflame today's problems with yesterday's remembrances.

Sincerely,

DON FUQUA,
President.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I think I pretty well covered the ground I want to cover with my colleagues. I simply appeal to them again. Do what is right in this situation. Ask yourself this question: Will our acting at this point in time, before the historical research is completed, undo one bit of wrong that has been done in the past? Will it bring back to life one person who gave his life or her life needlessly, without purpose, tragically? Will it do anything to help bring back the cultural identity of those who were attacked during this period of time? Mr. President, I do not believe we can answer yes to any of those questions.

On the other hand, if we ask the question will the passage of this resolution lead to less tolerance, will it lead to more understanding, will it lead to more bitterness, will it lead to more conflicts of an ethnic nature in this region of the country, will it make it harder to lift the quality of life of the people, including Armenians, in the region, if we can answer yes to any of these questions, and I am fearful, Mr. President, the answer to all of them is yes, that it would be a serious mistake indeed for us to proceed.

So I hope my colleagues will think long and hard before they vote on this motion to proceed. I think if they do, they will join us in voting not to proceed on this matter at this time. They will join us in trying to take a constructive action to create a climate of understanding, a climate in which this kind of loss of life will never occur again, a climate of opinion in which the people of the world will come to respect each other and will guard against the practice of genocide, not only in this generation but for generations to come.

I urge my colleagues: Look at the facts, consider the implications. Ask yourself: Will the passage of this joint resolution do one thing to make this world more peaceful, more secure? Will it do one thing to promote understanding between people? I think when my colleagues reflect upon those questions they will make the decision to join the Senator from West Virginia and others in voting to delay consideration of this particular resolution.

Again, I want to salute my colleague from West Virginia for the position that he has taken in this matter. I know it has been difficult. I know him to be a man of great sympathy for those who have suffered. He is a person who constantly, time and time again, stands with the underdog in the U.S. Senate. I know it is not easy for him to take the position that some people might misunderstand, because he is a man of sympathy, a man of deep feelings, and a man of great personal integrity who has respect for and tolerance for people of all races and religions and ethnic backgrounds.

I believe in opposing this resolution's consideration at this time, he is standing for those principles and he is trying to create a climate in the world that will bring back that kind of understanding that is the ultimate protection against genocide and against human suffering. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAHAM). The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the able Senator from Oklahoma, the chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, for his very positive comments.

As I sat and listened, it was evident to me that he was speaking with compassion. He was speaking with concern for those who have been treated with injustice. His was a reasonable speech. I think that when the chairman of the Committee on Intelligence speaks to the Senate and asks rhetorically before we vote as to whether or not this indeed is the way to go to promote peace, understanding, and to promote good will among peoples and among nations, we ought to listen. We ought to think about those questions he asks.

So it was obvious to me that the Senator from Oklahoma was speaking as a matter of conscience and out of his concerns based on his intimate knowledge of our relations with Turkey and the importance of those good relations, the continuation of those good relations. I thank him for his statement. I commend him for his patriotism and for his ability to articulate points that we ought to ponder before we vote.

Mr. President, I understand that the Senator who is now presiding over the Senate, Mr. GRAHAM of Florida, wishes to speak. I will be happy to take the Chair while he speaks and then resume my speaking on the floor. However, may I say that if there are no other Senators who wish to speak following the Senator from Florida, I am quite willing to forgo the further making of my own speech. I have indicated prior to this moment a number of times that I came to the floor at 1:15 today and began speaking at 1:30 with a speech. I have another one down on my desk. This is 68 pages in length. I delivered 11 pages in an hour and a half. So at that rate, it would only take us six times that to deliver the 68 pages. That will be 9 hours. I have spoken an hour and a half. That would leave 7½, by the old math. But I will be happy to forgo finishing that speech and go home and see my wife, Erma, and my little dog Billy Byrd who are waiting to see the old boy come home.

When I was a Member of the House of Representatives, I used to go home to the southern part of West Virginia. Sometimes I would get there at 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning. I would knock on the door. My mom would let me in. She always asked me if I wanted something to eat. She wanted to fix me something to eat at 1 o'clock, 2 o'clock in the morning. Then when I lie down to sleep, I heard her prayers in the other room. Always when I left, she would say to me, "Robert, you be a good boy." I came on back to Washington and was ready to vote in the House the next day. "Robert, you be a good boy."

Well, I am wanting to go home, to see my wife Erma and my little dog Billy, Billy Byrd. It is always a great reunion when I go in at night and see Billy Byrd. He is a Maltese. He figures that he should eat what we eat. He sleeps on our bed. We feel the same way about him. He should eat what we eat, and we love him and he loves us.

So I am willing to forgo the remaining 7½ hours of this portion of my speech and spare everyone present the time it would take for them to listen to this speech, although it would be eloquent. And if something should happen that I not make the rest of it, I am sure they will be sorry that I did not complete it tonight. But I cannot always please everybody around here.

So I will be happy to forgo the making of the rest of the speech, if other Senators do not want to listen or cannot come to the floor, or do not wish to speak.

Now, if there are other Senators who wish to speak, I may want to finish my speech. But I believe at this time, if the distinguished leader will permit me, I will take the chair and relieve the Senator from Florida so he can make a few remarks.

Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRAHAM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida is recognized, and, without objection, the rights of the Senator from West Virginia to retain the floor following the speech of the Senator from Florida will be protected under the same terms and conditions which heretofore have been provided in such instances.

The Senator from Florida.

Mr. GRAHAM. Thank you, Mr. President. I wish to congratulate the President pro tempore, Senator BYRD, for the leadership that he has shown on this very sensitive issue that we are dealing with as we debate Senate Joint Resolution 212.

During the past almost 2 days, and particularly the last several hours this afternoon, Senator BYRD has shown a grasp of the issues which is truly impressive and a great asset to all of his colleagues in the Senate. Senator BYRD understands the ramifications which Senate action on this issue may have, and he has given this body very sound advice over these past 2 days. I hope that we will be wise enough to follow it.

Mr. President, the resolution which we are considering asks the President to declare April 24 to be a day of remembrance commemorating the 1915–23 genocide of the Armenian people. Many have cosponsored this joint resolution, Mr. President. I want to state that I was a cosponsor of this joint resolution. When I did so I thought that we were operating within our tradition of concern for human rights, that we were commemorating a tragic event of 75 years ago. I believed that this legislation, if enacted, would have no repercussions beyond the expression of congressional and executive concern.

Mr. President, the essence of this joint resolution is one with which we Americans can all identify. We are a nation which dates its very beginning from the Declaration of Independence. When Abraham Lincoln stood on that field in Gettysburg in 1863, and started his most famous of American addresses with the statement that, "Four score and 7 years ago," he was speaking of the history of this Nation with the Declaration of Independence, a great statement of our national commitment to universal human rights.

We are all aware of the stability of the Armenian people, a people who, for reasons that defy understanding, have suffered a series of tragedies throughout their existence, a people who have, once given the opportunity for freedom and liberty, made such enormous contributions in every nation in which they have settled, most particularly in the United States of America. So when a resolution such as this was presented, it had an immediate appeal to our traditions and to our sense of justice.

Mr. President, I have now reluctantly withdrawn my name as a cosponsor, and I believe it is appropriate to convey to my colleagues and to my constituents in Florida why I have done so.

I have done so because I have come to a recognition that there are real consequences of what we do in the U.S. Senate, that resolutions like this can have a profound effect. They are not cost-free opportunities to go on the record. I was particularly made aware of this last August.

Last year the Senate approved a resolution criticizing Yugoslavia for its treatment of the ethnic Albanians living in the Kosovo Province. This was a joint resolution which was passed late one evening without even the kind of discussion that we are having now on Senate Joint Resolution 212. What were the implications of that resolution?

The resolution contributed to Yugoslavia recalling its Ambassador from the United States. Last August, when I visited in Yugoslavia for purposes of attending a conference on United States-European Soviet relations, we were accosted by Yugoslavs who felt that the United States had taken the Albanian side in what was obviously a highly emotional issue.

The Foreign Minister of Yugoslavia spoke to this gathering and focused a considerable amount of his attention on the strain that this resolution had created between Yugoslavia and the United States of America. Here we have a country that, long before the events of 1989, had been a country that had been proud to stand for some values of independence, sovereignty, and resist Soviet domination in a very contentious corner of the world, and which we, by a joint resolution passed without much appreciation of its consequences, had just condemned.

Of course, we want to speak out for human rights violations. The Senate has and will continue to do so, but in so doing we must speak knowledgeably, fairly, and with a full appreciation of the impact which our actions must have.

That action last year relative to the Yugoslavs, the Albanians, and Kosovo failed to meet those tests. I suggest that, if we were to take an affirmative action on Senate Joint Resolution 212, we would again fail to meet the test of acting knowledgeably, fairly, and with a full appreciation of the consequences of our actions.

There is no doubt that passage of this joint resolution would greatly harm relations with an important ally of the United States of America.

There are few issues around on which the Turkish people can achieve a consensus of opinion. Vigorously resisting the charge of genocide is one of those issues. This is true, despite however much the resolution sponsors deny its applicability to present-day Turkey. The Turkish Government is bound by history and public opinion to take action, should the United States enact this joint resolution.

The seriousness with which the Turkish Government views passage of this joint resolution is demonstrated by its reaction to approval last October of this resolution by the Senate Judiciary Committee. What was that action? That action was to restrict United States military travel in Turkey. If they would take that action, Mr. President, just by the force of the committee vote to recommend this resolution to the full Senate, what action could we anticipate, should the full Senate then approve this resolution?

Turkey continues to be a key NATO ally. Joint United States-Turkish military installations are central to our ability to protect NATO's southern flank. A strong relationship between the United States and Turkey is an important component of the United States' ability to influence events throughout the Middle East. The United States-Turkish relationship remains paramount, even during a time of easing East-West tensions.

Congressional consideration of the resolution has moved far beyond commemorating a historical event. Congress is now conducting full-fledged foreign policy debates. To date, no one has seriously suggested weakening the United States-Turkish relationship. Yet, passage of this legislation would force the Turks to act contrary to United States world interests.

Mr. President, passage of this joint resolution threatens to increase ethnic violence. Recent events in the Soviet Union underscore the deep seated hostilities which exist in the Transcaucasus.

The civil war being waged by the Azeris and Armenians demonstrates that national sentiments lie just below the surface. All nations should refrain from taking action that would widen that violence, that would lacerate old wounds.

Despite this considerable surface appeal, this resolution does far more than mark a tragedy. It unwittingly puts Congress in the position of becoming a court in a historical dispute. Its enactment will force Turkey to take actions weakening a key United States political and military alliance. I, therefore, urge my colleagues to accept the wisdom of conscious nonaction, to recognize the potential adverse impact of the adoption of this resolution, however well intended.

Mr. President, I congratulate the Presiding Officer on his leadership in this important issue. I trust we will follow.

I yield the floor.

Mr. HOLLINGS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HOLLINGS] is recognized without objection under the same terms and conditions that prevail as with the Senator from Florida [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Presiding Officer, not just for his customary courtesy but more particularly for taking on the lead in this Armenian resolution on behalf of Turkey, and on behalf, I think, of the right of the particular situation.

I remember one time back in South Carolina, I had the occasion at a lunch to introduce Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker, and he erected a statue in his talk to Joe McCarthy. Later that evening, I had to introduce Col. Bob Stevens, former Secretary of the Army, who promptly tore the statue down.

We had, earlier today, one of the world's great heroes, Vaclav Havel, the President of Czechoslovakia. He erected a statue to NATO, using the words contributing to the salvation of us Europeans and saving the world.

Now this evening, there are those who would take this great NATO ally and tear the statue down. I am back in the same situation. I resist that, and I want to join with the distinguished former majority leader in the sense that Turkey has been a very, very stalwart friend, loyal ally, a Moslem democracy. I visited there on several occasions.

Were it not for this particular strength on that underbelly, in this bipolarity referred to by our hero, Vaclav Havel, earlier today, I do not think that would have occurred, that we would have been hearing President Havel as the President today.

That is one of the contributions. I do not single that out as the only one. Let me say this with respect to this hero, which is the real purpose of my taking a minute here as we close this evening.

In November 1970, I had occasion, with Senator Javits of New York, Senator Jackson of Washington, and Senator CLAIBORNE PELL of Rhode Island, and other Senators, to visit Prague, Czechoslovakia. We were anxious to see this leader of the group of 77, which was leading the resistance. And we were told that we were not the only ones who were looking for him. The Czech authorities were, too. Seemingly, they always had some exceptions to him every meeting with visiting free-world citizens on the one hand or, on the other hand, something else that he may be charged with. So it would not be easy. We made three passes.

On the final pass on the way to the airport, they said there is still one chance. And we wound up the mountain out of the regular route to the airport into a little home, and we gathered around in a bedroom, and we were seated there for sometime waiting. And Havel came out of the closet and sat down on the bed and we started a conversation.

Senator Jackson, our senior member, immediately started explaining what we were doing, the United States of America, for freedom and specifically for arms control. He went into how we had gotten a SALT II agreement and hoped to ratify that; that we will finally get an agreement with the Soviets.

Mr. Havel said we are not interested in that. He said—I am cutting the answer short due to the late hour—in substance that, look, the Soviets will negotiate, negotiate and negotiate. Generally, they will get an agreement favorable to themselves. But irrespective of its favorable or unfavorable nature, they would violate it at will. And he started listing the broken agreements.

In a recovery effort, Senator Jackson said, well, as you know, we are very, very strong and proud of you dissidents here in resisting, and we are trying to support you with all the economic pressure that we can possibly bring.

Mr. Havel looked him in the eye and said, Mr. Senator, we are not interested in that.

Senator Jackson said, to get out of the country, to help with those who wish to leave, and we have Jackson-Vanik—I never will forget that.

Havel said, I am totally familiar with that, but that is not our wish, to leave this country. He said, Czechoslovakia was raped in 1938, 1948, and 1968. He said, if my generation, our group, does not stick it out and see it through to freedom, the world will never know Czechoslovakia as we have known it.

That set not just Senator Jackson back, but all the Senators. We talked about it on the way to the airport. I reviewed it when Havel came to my attention again last fall. I noted this fellow was a real courageous individual, but somehow or other he was a little goofy, thinking there was a chance in his lifetime or mine to see the freedom of Czechoslovakia.

I noted today, because we refreshed our memories at the joint meeting, and then later at the luncheon, to say that this man is a true patriot. He is absolutely not just courageous, but committed. You can tell it from his speech, as delivered. Incidentally, he is very literate, and he wrote every word of this himself. I was told that many tried to change the wording, to leave out this or that, do not emphasize another thing; but this is his own selection.

I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE CZECHOSLOVAK REPUBLIC TO A JOINT MEETING OF THE UNITED STATES CONGRESS, WASHINGTON, DC, FEBRUARY 21, 1990

Dear Mr. Speaker, dear Mr. President, dear Senators, and Members of the House, ladies and gentlemen: My advisors have advised me, on this important occasion, to speak in Czech. I don't know why. Perhaps they wanted you to enjoy the sweet sounds of my mother tongue.

The last time they arrested me, on October 27 of last year, I didn't know whether it was for two days or two years.

Exactly one month later, when the rock musician Michael Kocab told me that I would probably be proposed as a presidential candidate, I thought it was one of his usual jokes.

On the 10th of December 1989, when my actor friend Jiri Bartoska, in the name of the Civic Forum, nominated me as a candidate for the office of President of the Republic, I thought it was out of the question that the parliament we had inherited from the previous regime would elect me.

Twelve days later, when I was unanimously elected President of my country, I had no idea that in two months I would be speaking in front of this famous and powerful assembly, and that what I say would be heard by millions of people who have never heard of me and that hundreds of politicians and political scientists would study every word I say.

When they arrested me on October 27, I was living in a country ruled by the most conservative Communist government in Europe, and our society slumbered beneath the pall of a totalitarian system. Today, less than four months later, I am speaking to you as the representative of a country that has set out on the road to democracy, a country where there is complete freedom of speech, which is getting ready for free elections, and which wants to create a prosperous market economy and its own foreign policy.

It is all very strange indeed.

But I have not come here to speak of myself or my feelings, or merely to talk about my own country. I have used this small example of something I know well, to illustrate something general and important.

We are living in very odd times. The human face of the world is changing so rapidly that none of the familiar political speedometers are adequate.

We playwrights, who have to cram a whole human life or an entire historical era into a two-hour play, can scarcely understand this rapidity ourselves. And if it gives us trouble, think of the trouble it must give to political scientists, who spend their whole lives studying the realm of the probable. And have less experience in the improbable than us playwrights.

Let me try to explain why I think the velocity of the changes in my country, in Central and Eastern Europe, and of course in the Soviet Union itself, has made such a significant impression on the face of the world today, and why it concerns the fate of us all, including you Americans. I would like to look at this, first from the political point of view, and then from a point of view that we might call philosophical.

Twice in this century, the world has been threatened by a catastrophe; twice this catastrophe was born in Europe, and twice you Americans, along with others, were called upon to save Europe, the whole world and yourselves. The first rescue mission—among other things—provided significant help to us Czechs and Slovaks.

Thanks to the great support of your President Wilson, our first president, Tomas Garrigue Masaryk, could found our modern independent state. He founded it, as you know, on the same principles on which the United States of America had been founded, as Masaryk's manuscripts held by the Library of Congress testify.

At the same time, the United States was making enormous strides. It became the most powerful nation on earth, and it understood the responsibility that flowed from this. Proof of this are the hundreds of thousands of your young citizens who gave their lives for the liberation of Europe, and the graves of American airmen and soldiers on Czechoslovak soil.

But something else was happening as well: the Soviet Union appeared, grew, and transformed the enormous sacrifices of its people suffering under totalitarian rule, into a strength that, after World War Two, made it the second most powerful nation in the world. It was a country that rightly gave people nightmares, because no one knew what would occur to its rulers next and what country they would decide to conquer and drag into their sphere of influence, as it is called in political language.

All of this taught us to see the world in bipolar terms, as two enormous forces, one a defender of freedom, the other a source of nightmares. Europe became the point of friction between these two powers and thus it turned into a single enormous arsenal divided into two parts. In this process, one half of the arsenal became part of that nightmarish power, while the other—the free part—bordering on the ocean and having no wish to be driven into it, was compelled, together with you, to build a complicated security systems, to which we probably owe the fact that we still exist.

So you may have contributed to the salvation of us Europeans, of the world and thus of yourselves for a third time: you have helped us to survive until today—without a hot war this time—but merely a cold one.

And now what is happening is happening: the totalitarian system in the Soviet Union and in most of its satellites is breaking down and our nations are looking for a way to democracy and independence. The first act in this remarkable drama began when Mr. Gorbachev and those around him, faced with the sad reality of their country, initiated their policy of "perestroika". Obviously they had no idea either what they were setting in motion or how rapidly events would unfold. We knew a lot about the enormous number of growing problems that slumbered beneath the honeyed, unchanging mask of socialism. But I don't think any of us knew how little it would take for these problems to manifest themselves in all their enormity, and for the longings of these nations to emerge in all their strength. The mask fell away so rapidly that, in the flood of work, we have literally no time even to be astonished.

What does all this mean for the world in the long run? Obviously a number of things. This is, I am firmly convinced, an historically irreversible process, and as a result Europe will begin again to seek its own identity without being compelled to be a divided armory any longer. Perhaps this will create the hope that sooner or later your boys will no longer have to stand on guard for freedom in Europe, or come to our rescue, because Europe will at last be able to stand guard over itself. But that is still not the most important thing: the main thing is, it seems to me, that these revolutionary changes will enable us to escape from the rather antiquated straitjacket of this bipolar view of the world, and to enter at last into an era of multipolarity. That is, into an era in which all of us—large and small—former slaves and former masters—will be able to create what your great President Lincoln called "the family of man". Can you imagine what a relief this would be to that part of the world for some reason is called the Third World, even though it is the largest?

I don't think it's appropriate simply to generalize, so let me be specific:

(1) As you certainly know, most of the big wars and other conflagrations over the centuries have traditionally begun and ended on the territory of modern Czechoslovakia, or else they were somehow related to that area. Let the Second War stand as the most recent example. This is understandable: whether we like it or not, we are located in the very heart of Europe, and thanks to this, we have no view of the sea, and no real navy. I mention this because political stability in our country has traditionally been important for the whole of Europe. This is still true today. Our government of national understanding, our present Federal Assembly, the other bodies of the state and I myself will personally guarantee this stability until we hold free elctions, planned for June. We understand the terribly complex reasons, domestic political reasons above all, why the Soviet Union cannot withdraw its troops from our territory as quickly as they arrived in 1968. We understand that the arsenals built there over the past twenty years cannot be dismantled and removed overnight. Nevertheless, in our bilateral negotiations with the Soviet Union, we would like to have as many Soviet units as possible moved out of our country before the elections, in the interests of political stability. The more successful our negotiations, the more those who are elected in our places will be able to guarantee political stability in our country even after the elections.

(2) I often hear the question: how can the United States of America help us today? My reply is as paradoxical as the whole of my life has been: you can help us most of all if you help the Soviet Union on its irreversible, but immensely complicated road to democracy. It is far more complicated than the road possible to its former European satellites. You yourselves know best how to support, as rapidly as possible, the non-violent evolution of this enormous, multi-national body politic towards democracy and autonomy for all of its peoples. Therefore, it is not fitting for me to offer you any advice. I can only say that the sooner, the more quickly, and the more peacefully the Soviet Union begins to move along the road towards genuine political pluralism, respect for the rights of nations to their own integrity and to a working—that is a market—economy, the better it will be, not just for Czechs and Slovaks, but for the whole world. And the sooner you yourselves will be able to reduce the burden of the military budget born by the American people. To put it metaphorically: the millions you give to the East today will soon return to you in the form of billions in savings.

(3) It is not true that the Czech writer Vaclav Havel wishes to dissolve the Warsaw Pact tomorrow and then NATO the day after that, as some eager journalists have written. Vaclav Havel merely thinks what he has already said here, that for another hundred years, American soldiers shouldn't have to be separated from their mothers just because Europe is incapable of being a guarantor of world peace, which it ought to be, in order to make some amends, at least, for having given the world two world wars. Sooner or later Europe must recover and come into its own, and decide for itself how many of whose soldiers it needs so that its own security, and all the wider implications of that security, may radiate peace into the whole world. Vaclav Havel cannot make decisions about things it is not proper for him to decide. He is merely putting in a good word for genuine peace, and for achieving it quickly.

(4) Czechoslovakia thinks that the planned summit conference of countries participating in the Helsinki process should take place soon, and that in addition to what it wants to accomplish, it should aim to hold the so-called Helsinki Two conference earlier than 1992, as originally planned. Above all, we feel it could be something far more significant than has so far seemed possible. We think that Helsinki Two should become something equivalent to the European peace conference, which has not yet been held; one that would finally put a formal end to the Second World War and all its unhappy consequences. Such a conference would officially bring a future democratic Germany, in the process of unifying itself, into a new pan-European structure which could decide about its own security system. This system would naturally require some connection with that part of the globe we might label the "Helsinki" part, stretching westward from Vladivostok all the way to Alaska. The borders of the European states, which by the way should become gradually less important, should finally be legally guaranteed by a common, regular treaty. It should be more than obvious that the basis for such a treaty would have to be general respect for human rights, genuine political pluralism and genuinely free elections.

(5) Naturally we welcome the initiative of President Bush, which was essentially accepted by Mr. Gorbachev as well, according to which the number of American and Soviet troops in Europe should be radically reduced. It is a magnificent shot in the arm for the Vienna disarmament talks and creates favorable conditions not only for our own efforts to achieve the quickest possible departure of Soviet troops from Czechoslovakia, but indirectly as well for our own intention to make considerable cuts in the Czechoslovak army, which is disproportionately large in relation to our population. If Czechoslovakia were forced to defend itself against anyone, which we hope will not happen, then it will be capable of doing so with a considerably smaller army, because this time its defense would be—not only after decades but even centuries—supported by the common and indivisible will of both its nations and its leadership. Our freedom, independence and our new-born democracy have been purchased at great cost, and we will not surrender them. For the sake of order, I should add that whatever steps we take are not intended to complicate the Vienna disarmament talks, but on the contrary to facilitate them.

(6) Czechoslovakia is returning to Europe. In the general interest and in its own interest as well, it wants to coordinate this return—both politically and economically—with the other returnees, which means, above all, with its neighbors, the Poles and the Hungarians. We are doing what we can to coordinate these returns. And at the same time, we are doing what we can so that Europe will be capable of really accepting us, its wayward children. Which means that it may open itself to us, and may begin to transform its structures—which are formally European but de facto Western European—in that direction, but in such as way that it will not be to its detriment, but rather to its advantage.

(7) I have already said this in our parliament, and I would like to repeat it here, in this Congress, which is architecturally far more attractive: for many years, Czechoslovakia—as someone's meaningless satellite—has refused to face up honestly to its co-responsibility for the world. It has a lot to make up for. If I dwell on this and so many important things here, it is only because I feel—along with my fellow citizens—a sense of culpability for our former reprehensible passivity, and a rather ordinary sense of indebtedness.

(8) Last but not least, we are of course delighted that your country is so readily lending its support to our fresh efforts to renew democracy. Both our peoples were deeply moved by the generous offers made a few days ago in Prague at the Charles University, one of the oldest in Europe, by your Secretary of State, Mr. James Baker. We are ready to sit down and talk about them.

Ladies and gentlemen, I've only been president for two months and I haven't attended any schools for presidents. My only school was life itself. Therefore I don't want to burden you any longer with my political thoughts, but instead I will move on to an area that is more familiar to me, to what I would call the philosophical aspect of those changes that still concern everyone, although they are taking place in our corner of the world.

As long as people are people, democracy in the full sense of the word will always be no more than an ideal; one may approach it as one would a horizon, in ways that may be better or worse, but it can never be fully attained. In this sense you too are merely approaching democracy. You have thousands of problems of all kinds, as other countries do. But you have one great advantage: you have been approaching democracy uninterruptedly for more than two hundred years, and your journey toward that horizon has never been disrupted by a totalitarian system. Czechs and Slovaks, despite their humanistic traditions that go back to the first millennium, have approached democracy for a mere twenty years, between the two world wars, and now for the three and a half months since the 17th of November of last year.

The advantage that you have over us is obvious at once.

The communist type of totalitarian system has left both our nations, Czechs and Slovaks—as it has all the nations of the Soviet Union and the other countries the Soviet Union subjugated in its time—a legacy of countless dead, and infinite spectrum of human suffering, profound economic decline, and above all enormous human humiliation. It has brought us horrors that fortunately you have not known.

At the same time, however—unintentionally, of course—it has given us something positive: a special capacity to look, from time to time, somewhat further than someone who has not undergone this bitter experience. A person who cannot move and live a somewhat normal life because he is pinned under a boulder has more time to think about his hopes than someone who is not trapped in this way.

What I am trying to say is this: we must all learn many things from you, from how to educate our offspring, how to elect our representatives, all the way to how to organize our economic life so that it will lead to prosperity and not to poverty, But it doesn't have to be merely assistance from the well-educated, the powerful and the wealthy to someone who has nothing and therefore has nothing to offer in return.

We too can offer something to you: our experience and the knowledge that has come from it.

This is a subject for books, many of which have already been written and many of which have yet to be written. I shall therefore limit myself to a single idea.

The specific experience I'm talking about has given me one great certainty: Consciousness precedes Being, and not the other way around, as the Marxists claim.

For this reason, the salvation of this human world lies nowhere else than in the human heart, in the human power to reflect, in human meekness and in human responsibility.

Without a global revolution in the sphere of human consciousness, nothing will change for the better in the sphere of our Being as humans, and the catastrophe towards which this world is headed, whether it be ecological, social, demographic or a general breakdown of civilization, will be unavoidable. If we are no longer threatened by world war, or by the danger that the absurd mountains of accumulated nuclear weapons might blow up the world, this does not mean that we have definitively won. We are in fact far from definitive victory.

We are still a long way from that "family of man"; in fact, we seem to be receding from the ideal rather than drawing closer to it. Interests of all kinds: personal, selfish, state, national, group and, if you like, company interests still considerably outweigh genuinely common and global interests. We are still under the sway of the destructive and vain belief that man is the pinnacle of creation, and not just a part of it, and that therefore everything is permitted. There are still many who say they are concerned not for themselves, but for the cause, while they are demonstrably out for themselves and not for the cause at all. We are still destroying the planet that was entrusted to us, and its environment. We still close our eyes to the growing social, ethnic and cultural conflicts in the world. From time to time we say that the anonymous megamachinery we have created for ourselves no longer serves us, but rather has enslaved us, yet we still fail to do anything about it.

In other words, we still don't know how to put morality ahead of politics, science and economics. We are still incapable of understanding that the only genuine backbone of all our actions—if they are to be moral—is responsibility. Responsiblity to something higher than my family, my country, my firm, my success. Responsibility to the order of Being, where all our actions are indelibly recorded and where, and only where, they will be properly judged.

The interpreter or mediator between us and this higher authority is what is traditionally referred to as human conscience.

If I subordinate my political behavior to this imperative mediated to me by my conscience, I can't go far wrong. If on the contrary I were not guided by this voice, not even ten presidential schools with two thousand of the best political scientists in the world could help me.

This is why I ultimately decided—after resisting for a long time—to accept the burden of political responsibility.

I'm not the first, nor will I be the last, intellectual to do this. On the contrary, my feeling is that there will be more and more of them all the time. If the hope of the world lies in human consciousness, then it is obvious that intellectuals cannot go on forever avoiding their share of responsibility for the world and hiding their distaste for politics under an alleged need to be independent.

It is easy to have independence in your program and then leave others to carry that program out. If everyone thought that way, pretty soon no one would be independent.

I think that you Americans should understand this way of thinking. Wasn't it the best minds of your country, people you could call intellectuals, who wrote your famous Declaration of Independence, your Bill of Human Rights and your Constitution and who—above all—took upon themselves the practical responsibility for putting them into practice? The worker from Branik in Prague that your President referred to in his State of the Union message this year is far from being the only person in Czechoslovakia, let alone in the world, to be inspired by those great documents. They inspire us all. They inspire us despite the fact that they are over two hundred years old. They inspire us to be citizens.

When Thomas Jefferson wrote that, "Governments are instituted among Men deriving their just Powers from the Consent of the Governed", it was a simple and important act of the human spirit.

What gave meaning to that act, however, was the fact that the author backed it up with his life. It was not just his words, it was his deeds as well.

I will end where I began: history has accelerated. I believe that once again, it will be the human mind that will notice this acceleration, give it a name, and transform those words into deeds.

Thank you.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, my appreciation for the good intentions of Senator DOLE and the supporters of Senate Joint Resolution 212 makes my opposition to this joint resolution not an easy matter. I understand their profound concern, and the profound concern of Armenians, that the tragedy which this resolution seeks to commemorate should not be forgotten or dismissed. And I fully agree with the general proposition that those who forget history are condemned to repeat it.

Also, I believe I can rightly be considered a friend of Armenians. My legislative record certainly testifies to my friendship. To cite a just a few examples of my support of Armenian concerns:

In this Congress, I cosponsored Senate Joint Resolution 178 expressing U.S. support for a peaceful settlement of the Nagorn-Karabagh dispute.

In the 100th Congress, I supported Senate Resolution 29 addressing the difficulties encountered by Armenian-Americans who seek to maintain regular contact with their relatives in the Soviet Union.

In the 99th Congress, as a Member of the House, I supported House Resolution 332 condemning the Soviet Government's persecution of Helsinki monitoring group members which included an Armenian organization.

Mr. President, I hope my support of these positions and many other positions of importance to Armenian-Americans is compelling evidence that I share their concerns and aspirations. I hope my record of friendship for Armenians and my appreciation of their past and present suffering will afford me the understanding of Armenians and all the supporters of Senate Joint Resolution 212.

I have heard from literally hundreds of people on both sides of this issue. There is intense emotion invested in the opposition to the resolution and there is intense emotion invested in support of the resolution. After careful consideration, I have come to the conclusion that I cannot support Senate Joint Resolution 212.

Mr. President, there are compelling national security reasons for my opposition, but they are not my only reasons. Turkey is a treasured ally in NATO. Turkey's contribution to NATO's success has been enormous. For over 40 years we have led NATO, and it has been a bulwark against the advance of the Soviet empire. With that empire now in decline, we should be careful to maintain the stability of our own alliances.

Our relations with our loyal NATO partner have steadily improved and are now, generally, excellent. I do not want—and I am sure that no Senator wants—to impede the progress of Turkish-American friendship or undermine the stability of the Atlantic Alliance.

Yet, given Turkey's intense and total opposition to this resolution, I fear that such an unfortunate state of events may be the consequence of its passage. The common defense of our countries and the many benefits that accrue to the United States from expanding friendship with Turkey are too valuable to risk in this manner. I assure you, Mr. President, that I appreciate the suffering of Armenians in eastern Anatolia in the last days of the Ottoman Empire. That tragedy, like the tragedies that have afflicted so many people throughout the violent history of this world, should never be forgotten.

Nor do I oppose this resolution solely for reasons of Realpolitik. I acknowledge and mourn the sad history of Armenians in the years 1915 to 1923. But I concur with the Secretary of State, Mr. Baker, that history should be the judge of the Armenian tragedy. And the history, Mr. President, is not yet entirely settled on this question. With the recent opening of the historical archives of the period for scholarly research, it would be well to heed Secretary Baker's advice and await the consequent findings of historians.

Let me stress again, Mr. President, that I am sympathetic to the concerns of Armenian-Americans and the supporters of this resolution. Let me assure Senator DOLE that I appreciate the sincerity and convictions which attend his judgment on this issue. But

I must respectfully disagree and vote against this resolution out of respect for present-day Turkey—the Turkey that is our strong and valued ally—and I must vote against it in anticipation of some fuller future examination of the tragic events of 70 years ago.

Thank you.

"JOINT RESOLUTION

"Whereas the State of Maine is currently experiencing a drastic decline in sales and other tax revenues; and

"Whereas the imposition of new demands upon those who struggle for preservation of financial stability would be a hardship for our citizenry; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That We, your Memorialists, respectfully urge and request the Congress of the United States not to pass any law or issue any federal mandate that has a fiscal impact on Maine without providing adequate funding; and be it further

"Resolved, That suitable copies of this Memorial, duly authenticated by the Secretary of State, be transmitted to the Honorable George H.W. Bush, President of the United States, to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to each Member of the Maine Congressional delegation."

POM-409. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Maine; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs:

"JOINT RESOLUTION

"Whereas the United States Department of Veterans Affairs has a plan to consolidate the regional office facility located at Togus, Maine with a similar facility in Manchester, New Hampshire; and

"Whereas this transfer will impose hardships on the veterans of our large and diverse state and will result in a loss of benefits to many as services routinely provided at Togus will no longer be provided there, requiring some veterans to travel great distances to New Hampshire to apply for certain services and to receive others; and

"Whereas these new hurdles will discourage eligible veterans from obtaining benefits to which they are rightfully entitled and will predictably result in a reduction in benefits received by Maine veterans and place new burdens on state veterans services and benefit programs; and

"Whereas such a consolidation may result in fewer inpatient and outpatient visits to the Togus medical facility, thus resulting in a further reduction of operating funds and services; and

"Whereas many positions and services may be eliminated by this consolidation resulting in a reduction in the number of caring and experienced employees, a loss which will directly and indirectly affect Maine veterans, veterans' families and the other citizens of this State; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That We, your Memorialists, respectfully urge and request the President and the Congress of the United States to intervene and take all appropriate actions to abandon any such consolidation plan; and be it further

"Resolved, That suitable copies of this Memorial, duly authenticated by the Secretary of State, be transmitted to the Honorable George H.W. Bush, President of the United States, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to each Member of the Maine Congressional Delegation."

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. BOSCHWITZ (for himself and Mr. LIEBERMAN):

S. 2149. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to stimulate employment in, and to promote revitalization of, economically distressed areas designated as enterprise zones, by providing Federal tax relief for employment and investments, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

ENTERPRISE ZONE IMPROVEMENTS ACT

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I join today with my distinguished colleague from Connecticut, Senator LIEBERMAN, in introducing the Enterprise Zone Improvements Act of 1990. For the past several years I, along with several colleagues in both the House and Senate, have worked to pass enterprise zone legislation. While we have met with modest success here in the Senate, we have been unable to obtain passage in the House.

I was pleased that President Bush included enterprise zone legislation among the list of initiatives he currently supports. As my colleagues know, an enterprise zone proposal is included in the President's 1991 budget. Consequently, I am convinced that this is the year when we have a good chance to get the legislation passed.

For those of my colleagues who are unfamiliar with the enterprise zone concept—though I think most are familiar with it—let me briefly describe it. An enterprise zone is a specific geographic area selected to receive special tax treatment by the Government with the goal of attracting business investment and development that might otherwise not occur. The zone designations are usually based on considerations such as unemployment, the poverty rate, and the quality of local and State government plans to reduce regulatory, tax, and other burdens in order to attract zone business and keep it. In other words, jobs will be taken to the neediest people through enterprise zone businesses located right in their neighborhoods.
